I. INTRODUCTION

On July 14, 2005, Plaintiffs John Doe I, John Doe II, John Doe III, and Global Exchange (collectively "Plaintiffs")<sup>1</sup> filed this class

1 action for damages and injunctive relief. On July 10, 2009, Plaintiffs 2 filed a first amended complaint. The amended complaint asserts causes
3 of action under the Alien Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1350; the Torture
4 Victim Protection Act, Pub. L. 102-256, 106 Stat. 73 (1992); state-law
5 unjust enrichment; and Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200 et seq.<sup>2</sup>

6 Defendants are Nestle, S.A. (based in Switzerland), Nestle, 7 U.S.A., and Nestle Cote d'Ivoire, S.A. (collectively "Nestle"); 8 Cargill, Incorporated ("Cargill, Inc."), Cargill Cocoa (based in the 9 United States), and Cargill West Africa, S.A. (collectively "Cargill"); 10 and Archer Daniels Midland Company ("Archer Daniels Midland") 11 (collectively "Defendants").<sup>3</sup>

12 Defendants Nestle U.S.A., Cargill Inc., and Archer Daniels Midland 13 have filed a Motion to Dismiss the First Amended Complaint for failure 14 to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.

16 II. LEGAL STANDARD

17 In order to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) Motion to Dismiss, a 18 plaintiff's complaint "must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted 19 as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. ___, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949 (2009) (quoting 20 Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007)). "A claim has 21 facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that

24 <sup>2</sup> In their Opposition, Plaintiffs have conceded their fourth and fifth 25 causes of action for breach of contract and negligence/recklessness under California state law.

26 <sup>3</sup> Plaintiffs allege that the subsidiary defendants were acting as 27 agents of the parent defendants, and that the parent defendants controlled and ratified the actions of their subsidiaries.
28 Plaintiffs also allege that the subsidiary defendants were alter egos of the parents. Plaintiffs also sue ten unnamed "Corporate Does."

1 allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is 2 liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. "Factual allegations must be 3 enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level on the 4 assumption that all of the complaint's allegations are true." Twombly, 5 550 U.S. at 555. A complaint that offers mere "labels and conclusions" 6 or "a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will 7 not do." Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1951; see also Moss v. U.S. Secret 8 Service, 572 F.3d 962, 969 (9th Cir. 2009) (citing Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 9 1951). Courts should not "unlock the doors of discovery for a 10 plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions." Iqbal, 129 S.Ct.
11 at 1950.

13 III. FACTS

14 The individual Plaintiffs are Malians who allege that they were 15 forced to labor on cocoa fields in Cote d'Ivoire. Plaintiffs seek 16 class status on behalf of similarly situated Malians who were forced to 17 labor in Cote d'Ivoire. The remaining Plaintiff, Global Exchange, is a 18 San Francisco-based human rights organization that promotes social 19 justice.

20 Plaintiffs allege that they have filed suit in the United States 21 because: (1) there is no law in Mali allowing civil damages for their 22 injuries caused by non-Malian cocoa exporters (as all Defendants are 23 American, European, or Ivorian corporations); (2) no suit can be 24 brought in Cote d'Ivoire because "the judicial system is notoriously 25 corrupt and would likely be unresponsive to the claims of foreign 26 children against major cocoa corporations operating in and bringing 27 significant revenue to Cote d'Ivoire" (FAC ¶ 2); (3) Plaintiffs and 28

1 their attorneys would be subjected to possible harm in Cote d'Ivoire on 2 account of general civil unrest and "the general hostility by cocoa 3 producers in the region"; and (4) the United States has provided an 4 appropriate forum for these claims through the Alien Tort Statute and 5 the Torture Victim Protection Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1350.

6 Plaintiffs claim that Defendants have aided and abetted violations 7 of international law norms that prohibit slavery; forced labor; child 8 labor; torture; and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment. Plaintiffs 9 also seek relief under state-law unjust enrichment. All Plaintiffs 10 (including Global Exchange) allege violations of Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code 11 § 17200.

12 Plaintiffs allege that Defendants obtain an "ongoing, cheap supply 13 of cocoa by maintaining exclusive supplier/buyer relationships with 14 local farms and/or farmer cooperatives in Cote d'Ivoire." (FAC ¶ 33.)<sup>4</sup> 15 These exclusive contractual arrangements allow Defendants "to dictate 16 the terms by which such farms produce and supply cocoa to them, 17 including specifically the labor conditions under which the beans are 18 produced." (Id.) Defendants control the farms' labor conditions "by 19 providing local farmers and/or farmer cooperatives inter alia ongoing

22 <sup>4</sup>Plaintiffs identify certain of Defendant Nestle's exclusive 23 relationships with suppliers Keita Ganda and Keita Baba from 24 plantations in Daloa, and supplier Lassine Kone from plantations in 25 Sitafa. (FAC ¶ 35.) Plaintiffs identify certain of Defendant Archer 26 Daniels Midland's exclusive relationships with suppliers including a 27 farmer cooperative called "SIFCA." (FAC ¶ 39.) Plaintiffs identify 28 certain of Defendant Cargill's exclusive relationships with Dote Colibaly, Soro Fonipoho, Sarl Seki, Lenikpo Yeo ("from which 19 Malian child slaves were rescued," FAC ¶ 42), Keita Ganda, and Keita Hippie. (FAC ¶ 42.) The Court notes that among the allegedly "exclusive" suppliers identified by Plaintiffs, one—Keita Ganda—is alleged to be an "exclusive" supplier of both Nestle and Cargill.
(FAC ¶¶ 35, 42.)

1 financial support, including advance payments and personal spending 2 money to maintain the farmers' and/or the cooperatives' loyalty as 3 exclusive suppliers; farming supplies, including fertilizers, tools and 4 equipment; training and capacity[-]building in particular growing and 5 fermentation techniques and general farm maintenance, including 6 appropriate labor practices, to grow the quality and quantity of cocoa 7 beans they desire." (FAC ¶ 34.) This oversight requires Defendants to 8 engage in "training and quality control visits [that] occur several 9 times per year and require frequent and ongoing visits to the farms 10 either by Defendants directly or via their contracted agents." (Id.)

11 Plaintiffs identify certain of Nestle's representations in which 12 Nestle states that it "provides assistance in crop production" and 13 performs "tracking inside our company supply chain, i.e. from the 14 reception of raw and packaging materials, production of finished 15 products to delivery to customers.'" (FAC ¶ 36 (quoting Nestle 16 "Principles of Purchasing," 2006).) Nestle also states that "[i]n 17 dealing with suppliers, Purchasing must insist on knowing the origin of 18 incoming materials and require suppliers to communicate the origin of 19 their materials,'" and that it "actively participate[s] as the first 20 link in an integrated supply chain,' 'develop[s] supplier 21 relationships,' and 'continually monitor[s] the performance, 22 reliability and viability of suppliers.'" (Id.) Nestle also states 23 that its "Quality System covers all steps in the food supply chain, 24 from the farm to the consumer of the final products . . . , includ[ing] 25 working together with producers and suppliers of raw . . . materials.'" 26 (FAC ¶ 37.) Finally, Nestle has stated that "[w]hile we do not own 27 any farmland, we use our influence to help suppliers meet better 28

1 standards in agriculture. . . . Working directly in our supply chain
2 we provide technical assistance to farmers.'" (FAC ¶ 38.) This 3 assistance "'ranges from technical assistance on income generation to 4 new strategies to deal with crop infestation, to specific interventions 5 designed to address issues of child labour,'" including "'[s]pecific 6 programmes directed at farmers in West Africa [such as] field schools 7 to help farmers with supply chain issues, as well as a grassroots 8 'training of trainers' programme to help eliminate the worst forms of 9 child labour.'" (Id.)

10 Plaintiffs identify certain of Archer Daniels Midland's 11 representations in which the company states that its relationship<sup>5</sup> with 12 the SIFCA cooperative "'gives ADM Cocoa an unprecedented degree of 13 control over its raw material supply, quality and handling.'" (FAC ¶ 14 39 (quoting ADM statements contained in 2001 article in Biscuit 15 World).) An Archer Daniels Midland executive has been quoted as saying 16 "'ADM Cocoa can deliver consistent top quality products by control of 17 its raw materials,' and that 'ADM is focused on having direct contact 18 with farmers in order to advise and support them to produce higher 19 quality beans for which they will receive a premium.'" (Id.) Archer 20 Daniels Midland has represented that it has a "'strong presence in 21 [cocoa] origin regions,'" and that "'ADM is working hard to help 22 provide certain farmer organizations with the knowledge, tools, and 23 support they need to grow quality cocoa responsibly and in a 24 sustainable manner. . . . ADM is providing much needed assistance to

26 <sup>5</sup> In a conclusory manner, Plaintiffs identify Archer Daniels Midland's 27 exclusive supplier relationship with SIFCA as involving an 28 "acquisition," without explaining whether this "acquisition" involves an exclusive contract or a formal integration of SIFCA into Archer Daniels Midland's corporate structure. (See FAC ¶ 39.)

1 organizations representing thousands of farmers and farming
2 communities. These efforts are making an impact at the farm level.'" 3 (FAC ¶ 40.) It has also stated that it "'is actively involved in long 4 term efforts to ensure that cocoa is grown responsibly and sustainably.
5 Such efforts include research into environmentally sound crop 6 management practices, plant breeding work to develop disease-resistant 7 varieties, and farmer field schools to transfer the latest know-how 8 into the hands of millions of cocoa farmers around the world. Starting 9 from the cocoa growers through to the world's top food and beverage 10 manufacturers, ADM Cocoa is committed to delivering the best in product 11 quality and service at every stage.'" (FAC ¶ 41 (quoting ADM Cocoa 12 Brochure).)

13 Plaintiffs allege that Cargill opened cocoa buying stations in 14 Daloa and Gognoa, and that Cargill's Micao cocoa processing plant has 15 obtained ISO 9002 certification. Plaintiffs allege that the ISO 9002 16 certification "is a system of quality standards for food processing 17 from sourcing through processing that inherently requires detailed 18 visits and monitoring of farms." (FAC ¶ 43.)

19 With respect to all Defendants, Plaintiffs allege generally that 20 "Defendants' ongoing and continued presence on the cocoa farms" 21 provided "Defendants" with "first hand knowledge of the widespread use 22 of child labor on said farms." (FAC ¶ 44.) Plaintiffs also allege 23 that various governmental and non-governmental actors have provided 24 "numerous, well-documented reports of child labor." (Id.) Plaintiffs 25 allege that "Defendants not only purchased cocoa from farms and/or 26 farmer cooperatives which they knew or should have known relied on 27 forced child labor in the cultivating and harvesting of cocoa beans, 28

1 but Defendants provided such farms with money, supplies, and training
2 to do so with little or no restrictions from the government of Cote 3 d'Ivoire." (FAC ¶ 47.) Plaintiffs allege that Defendants provided 4 this "money, supplies, and training . . . knowing that their assistance 5 would necessarily facilitate child labor." (FAC ¶ 52.)

6 Plaintiffs also allege that some of the cocoa farms are linked to 7 the Ivorian government: "Upon information and belief, several of the 8 cocoa farms in Cote d'Ivoire from which Defendants source are owned by 9 government officials, whether directly or indirectly, or are otherwise 10 protected by government officials either through the provision of 11 direct security services or through payments made to such officials 12 that allow farms and/or farmer cooperatives to continue the use of 13 child labor." (FAC ¶ 47.)

14 Plaintiffs allege that "Defendants, because of their economic 15 leverage in the region and exclusive supplier/buyer agreements, each 16 had the ability to control and/or limit the use of forced child labor 17 by the supplier farms and/or farmer cooperatives from which they 18 purchased their cocoa beans, and indeed maintained specific policies 19 against the use of such forced labor practices." (FAC ¶ 48.)

20 Plaintiffs identify various representations in which Defendants 21 asserted that they abide by international standards, do not use child 22 labor, and take efforts to prevent their business partners from using 23 child labor. (FAC ¶¶ 49-51.)

24 Plaintiffs also allege that Defendants lobbied against a 2001
25 United States Congressional proposal to require chocolate manufacturers 26 and importers to certify and label their products as "slave free."
27 (FAC ¶¶ 53-54.) As a result of Defendants' lobbying efforts, the 28

1 mandatory law was replaced by a voluntary arrangement known as the 2 Harkin-Engel protocol, in which the chocolate industry agreed upon 3 certain standards by which it would self-regulate its labor practices.
4 (FAC ¶ 55.) Plaintiffs allege that "but for" this lobbying effort, 5 Defendants' cocoa plantations would not have been able to use child 6 labor.<sup>6</sup>

7 Plaintiff Global Exchange asserts a cause of action under Cal.
8 Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. Plaintiffs allege that Global Exchange's 9 members are American chocolate consumers who "have expressed a clear 10 desire to purchase products that are not made under exploitative 11 conditions but are incapable of determining whether products contain 12 slave labor produced cocoa or non-slave labor produced cocoa." (FAC ¶ 13 61.) Their "interests are being harmed by having to purchase products 14 containing illegally imported, slave labor produced cocoa against their 15 clearly expressed wishes," (FAC ¶ 61), thus causing them to "suffer[] 16 specific and concrete injuries." (FAC ¶ 60.) Additionally, Plaintiffs 17 allege that Global Exchange "has fair trade stores" that sell "fair 18 trade chocolate," and as a result of Defendants' actions, Global 19 Exchange's stores "have been forced to pay a premium for this chocolate 20 due to the unfair competition of slave produced chocolate." (FAC ¶ 21 60.) Plaintiffs also allege that Global Exchange "has . . . been 22 forced to spend significant resources in providing fairly traded 23 chocolate, educating members of the public, and monitoring Defendants' 24 corporate obligation not to use child labor." (FAC ¶ 62.)

27 <sup>6</sup> The Court notes that the Congressional effort took place in 2001, 28 but the named Plaintiffs ceased working on the cocoa plantations in

1 IV. SOSA V. ALVAREZ-MACHAIN AND INTERNATIONAL LAW

2 A. CAUSES OF ACTION FOR VIOLATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

3 1. SOSA V. ALVAREZ-MACHAIN

4 In Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692 (2004), the Supreme Court
5 established the requirements for bringing an action under the Alien 6 Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1350.<sup>7</sup> The Court held that § 1350 is solely a 7 jurisdictional statute and does not create any causes of action.
8 Instead, a limited number of international-law based causes of action 9 are provided by the common law. Thus, although the Alien Tort Statute 10 provides broad federal court jurisdiction for any tort committed in 11 violation of customary international law, Sosa sharply circumscribed 12 the availability of private causes of action that are cognizable in 13 federal courts under § 1350.

14 Not all international law norms provide a common law cause of 15 action under § 1350 – to be actionable, it must be a well-defined and 16 universally recognized norm of international law. As explained by the 17 Court, “the ATS was meant to underwrite litigation of a narrow set of 18 common law actions derived from the law of nations.” Sosa, 542 U.S. at 19 721. In determining the scope of this “narrow set” of actions, courts 20 must engage in a two-part analysis: “courts should require any claim 21 based on the present-day law of nations to rest on [1] a norm of 22 international character accepted by the civilized world and [2] defined 23 with a specificity comparable to the features of the 18th-century

24 _____
25 <sup>7</sup> Courts refer to 28 U.S.C. § 1350 as the Alien Tort Statute, Alien 26 Tort Claims Act, or the Alien Tort Act. This Court adopts the 27 Supreme Court’s preferred version, the Alien Tort Statute.

28 In its entirety, the Alien Tort Statute provides: “The district courts shall have original jurisdiction of any civil action by an alien for a tort only, committed in violation of the law of nations or a treaty of the United States.” 28 U.S.C. § 1350.

1 paradigms we have recognized" – that is, the three common law
2 international law wrongs identified by Blackstone, "violation of safe 3 conducts, infringement of the rights of ambassadors, and piracy." Id.
4 at 725-26.<sup>8</sup> The Court added that federal courts "have no congressional 5 mandate to seek out and define new and debatable violations of the law 6 of nations," id. at 728, and firmly cautioned that "federal courts 7 should not recognize private claims under federal common law for 8 violations of any international law norm with less definite content and 9 acceptance among civilized nations than the historical paradigms 10 familiar when § 1350 was enacted." Id. at 732. In a footnote, the 11 Court noted that "[a] related consideration is whether international 12 law extends the scope of liability for a violation of a given norm to 13 the perpetrator being sued, if the defendant is a private actor such as 14 a corporation or individual." Id. at 732 n.20.

15 2. SOURCES OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

16 With these basic rules in mind, it is important to have a clear 17 understanding of the sources of international law upon which courts

19 <sup>8</sup> Commentators have suggested that only one of these three violations 20 is the true inspiration for the Alien Tort Statute. See Sosa, 542 21 U.S. at 716-17 (discussing 1784 Marbois affair, which involved 22 private citizen's infringement of rights of French diplomatic 23 representative); Thomas H. Lee, The Safe-Conduct Theory of the Alien 24 Tort Statute, 106 Colum. L. Rev. 830 (2006) (discussing safe conduct 25 as inspiration of Alien Tort Statute); Eugene Kontorovich, The Piracy 26 Analogy: Modern Universal Jurisdiction's Hollow Foundation, 45 Harv.
27 Int'l L.J. 183 (2004) (discussing piracy as proper basis of Alien 28 Tort Statute); see also Joseph Modeste Sweeney, A Tort Only in Violation of the Law of Nations, 18 Hastings Int'l & Comp. L. Rev.
445 (1995) (asserting that Alien Tort Statute applies only to the law of prize; that is, capture of enemy merchant vessels on high seas).

In other words, "it is fair to say that a consensus understanding of what Congress intended has proven elusive." Sosa, 542 U.S. at 718-19. This Court agrees with the Supreme Court's observation that "we would welcome any congressional guidance" in this area of law. Id. at 731.

1 must rely in determining whether a particular norm is universally 2 accepted and defined with the requisite specificity. As explained in 3 The Paquete Habana, 175 U.S. 677, 700 (1900) (cited in Sosa, 542 U.S.
4 at 734), "international law is part of our law," and courts should look 5 to the following sources for guidance:

6 where there is no treaty and no controlling executive or 7 legislative act or judicial decision, resort must be had to the 8 customs and usages of civilized nations, and, as evidence of 9 these, to the works of jurists and commentators who by years of 10 labor, research, and experience have made themselves peculiarly well acquainted with the subjects of which they treat. Such works are resorted to by judicial tribunals, not for the speculations of their authors concerning what the law ought to be, but for trustworthy evidence of what the law really is.

11 The Paquete Habana, 175 U.S. at 700 (citing Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U.S.
12 113, 163, 164, 214, 215 (1895)). The Court also stated that 13 international law norms must be agreed upon "by the general consent of 14 the civilized nations of the world," id. at 708, or, as phrased in 15 international law, opinio juris.

16 The approach set out in The Paquete Habana is consistent with the 17 modern view of customary international law. As stated in the Statute 18 of the International Court of Justice (the authoritative institution in 19 adjudicating international law), the sources of international law are:

- 20 a. international conventions, whether general or particular, 21 establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting states; 22 b. international custom, as evidence of a general practice 23 accepted as law;
24 c. the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations; 25 d. subject to the provisions of Article 59,<sup>9</sup> judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law.

25 ICJ Statute, June 26, 1945, art. 38(1), 59 Stat. 1055, 1060, U.S.T.S.

26 _____
27 <sup>9</sup> Article 59 provides that "[t]he decision of the Court has no binding 28 force except between the parties and in respect of that particular case." ICJ Statute, art. 59.

1 993.<sup>10</sup>

2 In practice, this requires an exhaustive examination of treaties, 3 court decisions, and leading treatises.<sup>11</sup> As a model example, the

5 <sup>10</sup> The Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations outlines a similar set 6 of guidelines:

7 (1) A rule of international law is one that has been accepted as 8 such by the international community of states

9 (a) in the form of customary law;

10 (b) by international agreement; or 11 (c) by derivation from general principles common to the 12 major legal systems of the world.

13 (2) Customary international law results from a general and 14 consistent practice of states followed by them from a sense of 15 legal obligation.

16 (3) International agreements create law for the states parties 17 thereto and may lead to the creation of customary international 18 law when such agreements are intended for adherence by states 19 generally and are in fact widely accepted.

20 (4) General principles common to the major legal systems, even 21 if not incorporated or reflected in customary law or 22 international agreement, may be invoked as supplementary rules 23 of international law where appropriate.

24 Restatement, § 102. And as further explained in Section 103(2):

25 In determining whether a rule has become international law, 26 substantial weight is accorded to 27 (a) judgments and opinions of international judicial and 28 arbitral tribunals;

(b) judgments and opinions of national judicial tribunals;

(c) the writings of scholars;

(d) pronouncements by states that undertake to state a rule of international law, when such pronouncements are not seriously challenged by other states.

Id. at § 103(2); see also id. at § 112 (noting that United States courts follow the approach contained in § 103, but that the Supreme Court's interpretations are binding upon lower courts).

<sup>11</sup> The Restatement, § 103 n.1, helpfully explains the role of scholarly sources as evidence of customary international law:

Such writings include treatises and other writings of authors of standing; resolutions of scholarly bodies such as the Institute of International Law (Institut de droit international) and the International Law Association; draft texts and reports of the International Law Commission, and systematic scholarly presentations of international law such as this Restatement.

Which publicists are "the most highly qualified" is, of course, not susceptible of conclusive proof, and the authority of writings as evidence of international law differs greatly. The 1 Supreme Court in Sosa, 542 U.S. at 732, referred to the lengthy, 2 polyglot footnote in United States v. Smith, 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) 153

3 (1820). The Smith Court examined over a dozen treatises in English, 4 Latin, French, and Spanish, as well as English caselaw, and determined 5 that these various sources all agreed upon the same basic definition of 6 piracy under international law. Smith, 18 U.S. at 163-80 n.h.

7 3. INTERNATIONAL LAW CAUSES OF ACTION AFTER SOSA

8 Ultimately, Sosa provides that international law norms are only 9 actionable if they are specifically defined and universally adhered to 10 out of a sense of mutual obligation. Other courts, quoted in Sosa, 542 11 U.S. at 732, have explained that this requires a showing that the 12 violation is one of a "handful of heinous actions," Tel-Oren v. Libyan 13 Arab Republic, 726 F.2d 774, 781 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Edwards, J., 14 concurring), involving a norm that is "specific, universal, and 15 obligatory," In re Estate of Marcos Human Rights Litigation, 25 F.3d 16 1467, 1475 (9th Cir. 1994), resulting in a finding that the actor is 17 "hostis humani generis, an enemy of all mankind." Filartiga v. Pena-18 Irala, 630 F.2d 876, 890 (2d Cir. 1980).

19 In defining the relevant norms of international law, domestic 20 courts should carefully distinguish the substance of international law 21 from the procedures of international law. See Sosa, 542 U.S. at 729-30 22 & n.18 (referring to Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64 (1938), and 23 discussing Alien Tort Statute as incorporating "substantive rules" of

25 views of the International Law Commission have sometimes been 26 considered especially authoritative.
27 In other words, it is important to exercise care when citing 28 secondary sources as authorities on the meaning of international law.
Accordingly, the Court has endeavored to rely on primary sources as much as possible.

1 international law<sup>12</sup>). For example, the Ninth Circuit's lead en banc 2 opinion in Sarei v. Rio Tinto, addressing the issue of exhaustion of 3 remedies, noted that Sosa requires an inquiry into "whether exhaustion 4 is a substantive norm of international law, to which the 'requirement 5 of clear definition' applies; or if it is nonsubstantive, what source 6 of law - federal common law or international law - illuminates its 7 content." Sarei v. Rio Tinto, PLC, 550 F.3d 822, 828 (9th Cir. 2008)
8 (en banc) (internal footnote and citations omitted).<sup>13</sup> In other words, 9 courts applying the Alien Tort Statute must determine whether the rule 10 at issue is substantive or non-substantive (i.e., procedural), and then

12 <sup>12</sup> The relevance of Erie appears to animate the majority opinion in 13 Sosa - but the Court certainly could have made this analogy more 14 apparent. See, e.g., Craig Green, Repressing Erie's Myth, 96 Cal. L.
15 Rev. 595, 598 (2008) ("In Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, Erie was a 16 touchstone of the Court's ATS analysis, and not one Justice 17 questioned Erie's relevance."); William R. Castro, The New Federal 18 Common Law of Tort Remedies for Violations of International Law, 37 19 Rutgers L. J. 635, 842-43 (2006) ("The federal courts' administration 20 of state law under the Erie doctrine presents a useful model for 21 thinking about international law as federal common law. . . . In ATS litigation, the most obvious divide between international and pure United States domestic law is the separation of substance from procedure. . . . [In examining international law's] substance, the norm for which a remedy is provided in ATS litigation is clearly governed by international law. All questions as to whether the defendant has acted unlawfully must be answered by recourse to rules of decision found in international law.").

22 <sup>13</sup> The Sarei majority ultimately held that Alien Tort Statute claims 23 include an exhaustion requirement; this majority was split, however, 24 over whether exhaustion was substantive or procedural in nature.
25 Three judges held that exhaustion was a "prudential" requirement of 26 domestic law, 550 F.3d at 828, 830-31, two held that it was a 27 substantive element of the international law claim, id. at 834-36, and one concurred in the result for other reasons, id. at 840-41. A dissenting opinion asserted that neither domestic nor international law requires exhaustion of remedies prior to filing an Alien Tort Statute action. Id. at 843-45.

The Court notes that Defendants' Motion does not raise the 28 exhaustion issues discussed in Sarei.

1 must determine whether that substantive international law is 2 sufficiently definite and universal to satisfy the requirements of 3 Sosa.<sup>14</sup>

4 In distinguishing between the substance and procedure of 5 international law, it is helpful to consider the guidelines set out by 6 a leading expert on international criminal law. According to M. Cherif 7 Bassiouni, who is among the most prolific and prominent authorities on 8 international criminal law, "the penal aspects of international 9 [criminal] law include: international crimes, elements of international 10 criminal responsibility, the procedural aspects of the 'direct 11 enforcement system' of international criminal law, and certain aspects 12 of the enforcement modalities of the 'indirect enforcement system' of 13 the International Criminal Court." M. Cherif Bassiouni, 1 14 International Criminal Law 5 (2008). Customary international law 15 defines the substantive elements of the crimes and the elements of 16 criminal responsibility, whereas the procedural enforcement mechanisms 17 are established largely on a case-by-case basis in response to 18 particular atrocities (though today, the International Criminal Court 19 is meant to provide a permanent forum for enforcement actions). Id. at

21 <sup>14</sup> The Ninth Circuit's lead opinion in Sarei somewhat enigmatically 22 held "that we may freely draw from both federal common law and 23 international law without violating the spirit of Sosa's instructions 24 or committing ourselves to a particular method regarding other 25 nonsubstantive aspects of ATS jurisprudence left open after Sosa." 26 Sarei, 550 F.3d at 828. On its face, this language suggests that 27 Sosa did not establish a clear substance-procedure distinction, and 28 that general federal common law can be incorporated into an Alien Tort Statute analysis.

26 Notably, however, the Sarei opinion specifically addressed 27 exhaustion of remedies, which was explicitly left open by the Supreme 28 Court as an area of law that is not necessarily governed by the Court's discussion of the proper method of substantive international law analysis. Sosa, 542 U.S. at 733 n.21.

1 7-8. The Supreme Court in Sosa instructed federal courts to look to 2 the substantive aspects of international law, not the procedural 3 details of particular international law enforcement mechanisms.
4 Because the Alien Tort Statute itself provides an independent domestic 5 enforcement mechanism, federal courts should not be distracted by the 6 procedural quirks of foreign and international legal systems. Federal 7 courts must be careful to apply only substantive international law – 8 that is, the elements of the criminal acts and the nature of criminal 9 responsibility – rather than the procedural elements of international 10 law. See Bassiouni, 1 International Criminal Law at 5-8.

11 It is important for courts to apply international law with a 12 careful eye on its substantive provisions, as Sosa repeatedly insisted 13 that only clearly defined, universally recognized norms are actionable 14 under the Alien Tort Statute. Though courts must look to various 15 sources to determine the scope of international law, courts should not 16 just “pick and choose from this seemingly limitless menu of sources” 17 and create a hybrid form of domestic common law that merely draws on 18 customary international law when convenient. See Abdullahi v. Pfizer, 19 Inc., 562 F.3d 163, 194 (2d Cir. 2009) (Wesley, J., dissenting), cert.
20 denied, 130 S.Ct. 3541 (2010). The Alien Tort Statute, as interpreted 21 in Sosa, does not permit federal courts to codify a new form of what 22 International Court of Justice Judge Philip Jessup termed 23 “transnational law,” which, as he explained, “includes both civil and 24 criminal aspects, [] includes what we know as public and private 25 international law, and [] includes national law both public and 26 private.” Philip Jessup, Transnational Law 106 (1956). Jessup 27 justified his proposed legal mélange on the ground that “[t]here is no 28

1 inherent reason why a judicial tribunal, whether national or 2 international, should not be authorised to choose from all these bodies 3 of law the rule considered to be most in conformity with reason and 4 justice for the solution of any particular controversy." Id. But, as 5 made abundantly clear in Sosa, such an idealized and ungrounded form of 6 international law is not a permissible source of authority for Alien 7 Tort Statute cases. Sosa requires that federal courts cannot look to 8 general principles of "reason and justice" drawn ad hoc from 9 international and domestic rules; rather, courts must look carefully to 10 the substantive norms of international law that are clearly defined and 11 universally agreed-upon. To do otherwise is to misapply Sosa and "open 12 the door" far too wide for Alien Tort Statute litigation. Sosa, 542 13 U.S. at 729 ("[T]he judicial power should be exercised on the 14 understanding that the door is still ajar subject to vigilant 15 doorkeeping, and thus open to a narrow class of international norms 16 today.").

17 B. THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN CIVIL AND CRIMINAL INTERNATIONAL LAW
18 NORMS

19 In its June 9, 2009 Order for further briefing, the Court 20 requested that the parties address the question of whether the 21 standards for liability under international law distinguish between 22 civil and criminal causes of action. In particular, the Court was 23 concerned with whether Sosa requires international law to establish 24 well-defined norms of civil liability in order for an Alien Tort 25 Statute action to lie. In light of this briefing, the Court has 26 reached the following conclusions.

27 There is no meaningful distinction in Alien Tort State litigation 28

1 between criminal and civil norms of international law. See, e.g., 2 Presbyterian Church of Sudan v. Talisman Energy, Inc., 582 F.3d 244, 3 257 n.7 (2d Cir. 2009) (citations omitted), pet'n for cert. filed, Apr.
4 15, 2010, May 20, 2010; Khulumani v. Barclay Nat. Bank Ltd., 504 F.3d
5 254, 270 n.5 (2d Cir. 2007) (Katzmann, J., concurring) (citations 6 omitted). This is supported by the Sosa opinion, by the historical 7 materials relevant to the Sosa Court's construction of the Alien Tort 8 Statute, and by Justice Breyer's concurrence in Sosa.

9 The majority opinion in Sosa pointedly quoted the proposition from 10 international scholar Beth Stephens that a "mixed approach to 11 international law violations, encompassing both criminal prosecution 12 . . . and compensation to those injured through a civil suit, would 13 have been familiar to the founding generation." Sosa, 542 U.S. at 724 14 (quoting Beth Stephens, Individuals Enforcing International Law: The 15 Comparative and Historical Context, 52 DePaul L. Rev. 433, 444 (2002)).
16 In other words, the Court suggested that international criminal law at 17 the time of the founding also contained a civil component.

18 This conclusion is supported by an examination of Blackstone, upon 19 whom the Sosa Court relied heavily. Notably, Blackstone discussed the 20 three "common law" international law violations (piracy, offenses on 21 the high seas, and offenses against ambassadors) as being criminal 22 offenses rather than civil offenses. Blackstone did not suggest that 23 these offenses could be redressed through common-law civil actions.
24 See Blackstone, 4 Commentaries, Ch. 5; see also Sosa, 542 U.S. at 723 25 ("It is true that Blackstone [] refer[red] to what he deemed the three 26 principal offenses against the law of nations in the course of 27 discussing criminal sanctions.") (emphasis added). However, Blackstone 28

1 did explain that violations of an ambassador's safe-conduct were 2 subject to statutory restitution. See Blackstone, 4 Commentaries, Ch.
3 5 ("if any of the king's subjects attempt or offend, upon the sea, or 4 in port within the king's obeisance, against any stranger in amity, 5 league, or under safe-conduct; and especially by attaching his person, 6 or spoiling him, or robbing him of his goods; the lord chancellor, with 7 any of the justices of either the king's bench or common pleas, may 8 cause full restitution and amends to be made to the injured.")
9 (emphasis added) (citing Statute of 31 Hen. VI., ch. 4).

10 As the Supreme Court recognized in Sosa, the Alien Tort Statute 11 requires that federal courts provide civil redress for these criminal 12 offenses. Sosa, 542 U.S. at 724 ("We think it is correct . . . to 13 assume that the First Congress understood that the district courts 14 would recognize private causes of action for . . . torts corresponding 15 to Blackstone's three primary offenses."). If we are to use 16 Blackstone's treatise as the lodestar of Alien Tort Statute analysis 17 (as the Supreme Court did in Sosa), then we must necessarily conclude 18 that the Alien Tort Statute exists precisely for the purpose of 19 providing civil redress to victims of violations of international 20 criminal law. See generally Jaykumar A. Menon, The Alien Tort Statute: 21 Blackstone and Criminal/Tort Law Hybridities, 4 J. Int'l Crim. Just.
22 372 (2006) (discussing implications of Alien Tort Statute's status as a 23 hybrid of criminal law and tort law).

24 Justice Breyer went further than the Sosa majority in discussing 25 the relationship between international criminal law and civil causes of 26 action. He noted that criminal punishment contains an element of

1 restitution in many legal systems.<sup>15</sup> Sosa, 542 U.S. at 762-63 (Breyer, 2 J., concurring). Notably, the International Criminal Court provides 3 for reparations and restitution as part of its jurisdiction over 4 international criminal law. See Rome Statute of the International 5 Criminal Court, July 17, 1998, 2187 U.N.T.S. 90, at arts. 75(2) ("The 6 Court may make an order directly against a convicted person specifying 7 appropriate reparations to, or in respect of, victims, including 8 restitution, compensation and rehabilitation."), 77(2)(b) ("In addition 9 to imprisonment, the Court may order . . . [a] forfeiture of proceeds, 10 property and assets derived directly or indirectly from that crime, 11 without prejudice to the rights of bona fide third parties.").

12 In short, even in the absence of a universally recognized civil 13 cause of action that exists under international law, the Alien Tort 14 Statute provides a domestic civil cause of action which incorporates 15 the universally recognized norms of international law, regardless of 16 whether they are criminal or civil. To hold otherwise would render 17 Sosa's references to Blackstone superfluous and, indeed, would cause 18 the entire foundation of the Alien Tort Statute to crumble, given that 19 there is no universally recognized norm of private civil liability for 20 international law violations. See generally Christine Gray, Judicial 21 Remedies in International Law (1987) (noting, inter alia, that 22 international law traditionally provides only for reparations between 23 states, not private civil remedies).

25 <sup>15</sup> For example, an Italian court recently held American CIA operatives 26 criminally liable (in absentia) for the abduction and extraordinary 27 rendition of an Egyptian while he was in Italy. See Italy Rules in 28 Rendition Case, Wall St. J., Nov. 5, 2009, at A12. In the verdict, the court also imposed a collective restitution obligation on the defendants in the amount of 1.5 million euros.

1           Accordingly, the Court concludes that the Alien Tort Statute 2 provides a civil cause of action for international law violations even 3 if international law itself does not clearly recognize a civil cause of 4 action for violations of that norm.

6 V. THE ALLEGED PRIMARY VIOLATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

7           Plaintiffs allege that Cote d'Ivoire farmers are responsible for 8 the following violations of Plaintiffs' rights under international law.
9 Plaintiffs further allege that Defendants have aided and abetted these 10 violations.

11           Defendants' Motion to Dismiss is aimed at the adequacy of 12 Plaintiffs' allegations of aiding and abetting. Because the Motion is 13 not directed at the underlying primary violations of international law 14 (i.e., the conduct of the Ivorian farmers), the Court assumes for 15 purposes of this Order that Plaintiffs have adequately alleged primary 16 violations of the following norms. The Court summarizes the applicable 17 facts and legal standards in order to provide context for the 18 discussion of Defendants' contribution (or lack thereof) to those 19 violations. It is helpful to thoroughly examine the details of the 20 alleged primary violation prior to addressing the parties' arguments 21 regarding secondary liability.

22 A. FORCED LABOR

23           It is widely acknowledged that the use of forced labor violates 24 international law. See Adhikari v. Daoud & Partners, 697 F. Supp. 2d 25 674, 687 (S.D. Tex. 2009) ("trafficking and forced labor . . . qualify 26 as universal international norms under Sosa); John Roe I v. Bridgestone 27 Corp., 492 F. Supp. 2d 988, 1014 (S.D. Ind. 2007) ("some forms of 28

1 forced labor violate the law of nations"); Jane Doe I v. Reddy, No. C 2 02-05570 WHA, 2003 WL 23893010, at *9 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 4, 2003) ("forced 3 labor . . . is prohibited under the law of nations"); Iwanowa v. Ford 4 Motor Co., 67 F. Supp. 2d 424, 441 (D.N.J. 1999) ("[T]he case law and 5 statements of the Nuremberg Tribunals unequivocally establish that 6 forced labor violates customary international law."); see also In re
7 World War II Era Japanese Forced Labor Litig., 164 F. Supp. 2d 1160, 8 1179 (N.D. Cal. 2001) ("this court is inclined to agree with the 9 Iwanowa court's conclusion that forced labor violates the law of 10 nations").

11 For present purposes, the Court adopts the definition of "forced 12 labor" supplied by the International Labour Organization Forced Labor 13 Convention of 1930: "all work or service which is exacted from any 14 person under the menace of any penalty and for which the said person 15 has not offered himself voluntarily." International Labour 16 Organization Convention No. 29 Concerning Forced or Compulsory Labor, 17 art. 2., 39 U.N.T.S. 55, entered into force, May 1, 1932. More 18 thorough definitions may be found in the treaties and conventions 19 identified in the Complaint (FAC ¶ 63), in the expert declaration of 20 Lee Swepston [docket no. 93], and in the Victims of Trafficking and 21 Violence Protection Act of 2000.<sup>16</sup>

23 <sup>16</sup> The Act provides that a person has engaged in forced labor if he:
24 knowingly provides or obtains the labor or services of a person 25 by any one of, or by any combination of, the following means-- 26 (1) by means of force, threats of force, physical 27 restraint, or threats of physical restraint to that person 28 or another person;
(2) by means of serious harm or threats of serious harm to that person or another person;
(3) by means of the abuse or threatened abuse of law or legal process; or

1           There are various examples of forced labor cases being brought 2 under the Alien Tort Statute (many of which, it should be noted, 3 predate Sosa). In one case, the district court held that the 4 plaintiffs' allegations were insufficient to state a claim under 5 international law where:

6           Plaintiffs allege that they have nothing left after they spend 7 their wages at [the defendant's] company stores and other company 8 facilities (such as schools), but they do not allege induced 9 indebtedness. Plaintiffs allege that they are physically isolated 10 at the Plantation, but they do not allege that [the defendant] 11 keeps them physically confined there. To the extent plaintiffs allege psychological compulsion, they are clearly alleging what the [International Labor Organization] report calls "pure economic necessity, as when a worker feels unable to leave a job because of the real or perceived absence of employment alternatives," which is not forced labor under international law.

12 John Roe I v. Bridgestone Corp., 492 F. Supp. 2d 988, 1014 (S.D. Ind.
13 2007).

14           In another case, the allegations were sufficient where the 15 plaintiffs alleged that they "were brought to the United States and 16 forced to work involuntarily[,] and [that] defendants reinforced their 17 coercive conduct through threats, physical beatings, sexual battery, 18 fraud and unlawful substandard working conditions." Jane Doe I v.
19 Reddy, 2003 WL 23893010, at *9. Similarly, in Licea v. Curacao Drydock 20 Co., Inc., 584 F. Supp. 2d 1355 (S.D. Fla. 2008), the plaintiffs 21 established that they were forced to work on oil platforms after having 22 been trafficked from Cuba to Curacao under threats of physical and 23 emotional harm.

24           In the present case, Plaintiffs allege that they were forced to 25 _____

26                   (4) by means of any scheme, plan, or pattern intended to 27                   cause the person to believe that, if that person did not 28                   perform such labor or services, that person or another person would suffer serious harm or physical restraint.
18 U.S.C. § 1589(a).

1 labor on cocoa fields. (FAC ¶¶ 57-59.) At least one Plaintiff (John 2 Doe I) alleges that he was trafficked from Mali to Cote d'Ivoire. (FAC 3 ¶ 57.) All three Plaintiffs were locked on their respective farms and 4 plantations and monitored at night by guards armed with guns and whips.
5 (FAC ¶¶ 57-59.) They were subjected to physical violence and related 6 psychological abuse that had the effect of forcing them to work and 7 remain on the farms. (FAC ¶¶ 57-59.) They were threatened with severe 8 beatings from whips and tree branches, being forced to drink urine, and 9 having their feet cut open. (Id.) They were not paid for their work, 10 were given inadequate amounts of food, and were forced to sleep in 11 groups in locked rooms, and at least one plaintiff was forced to sleep 12 on the floor. (Id.)

13 Because Defendants have not disputed that adequacy of these 14 allegations, the Court concludes for present purposes that these 15 allegations are sufficient constitute forced labor under international 16 law.

17 B. CHILD LABOR

18 It is clear that in some instances "child labor" constitutes a 19 violation of an international law norm that is specific, universal, and 20 well-defined. "Yet whatever one's initial reaction is to the broad 21 phrase 'child labor,' reflection shows that national and international 22 norms accommodate a host of different situations and balance competing 23 values and policies. . . . It is not always easy to state just which 24 practices under the label 'child labor' are the subjects of an 25 international consensus." John Roe I v. Bridgestone, 492 F. Supp. 2d 26 at 1020.

27 Plaintiffs submit an expert declaration from a former member of 28

1 the International Labour Organization, Lee Swebston. [Docket no. 93.]
2 Swebston's declaration reveals that the definitional concerns
3 identified by the John Roe I v. Bridgestone court apply with equal 4 force in the present case.<sup>17</sup> Nevertheless, for present purposes, the 5 Court assumes that the allegations in the First Amended Complaint are 6 analogous to the allegations at issue in John Roe I v. Bridgestone, a 7 case involving allegations of forced labor and child labor on a 8 Liberian rubber plantation:

9 [T]he Complaint states that defendants are actively encouraging - 10 even tacitly requiring - the employment of six, seven, and ten 11 year old children. Giving plaintiffs the benefit of their factual 12 allegations, the defendants are actively encouraging that these 13 very young children perform back-breaking work that exposes them 14 to dangerous chemicals and tools. The work, plaintiffs allege, 15 also keeps those children out of the [company-provided] schools.
16 The court understands that defendants deny the allegations, but 17 defendants have chosen to file a motion that requires the court to 18 accept those allegations as true, at least for now. [¶] The 19 circumstances alleged here include at least some practices that 20 could therefore fall within the "worst forms of child labor" 21 addressed in ILO Convention 182. The conditions of work alleged by 22 plaintiffs (and reported by the UN investigators) are likely to 23 harm the health and safety of at least the very youngest of the 24 child plaintiffs in this case.

25 John Roe I v. Bridgestone Corp., 492 F. Supp. 2d at 1021.<sup>18</sup>

26 The plaintiffs in the present case allege that they were forced to

27 <sup>17</sup> For example, a number of countries allow children of the age of 14 28 or 15 to engage in most or all types of labor. (See Swebston Decl.
Ex. B (Australia, Ethiopia, Fiji, Finland, India, Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Trinidad & Tobago).) A number of states in the U.S. are similar. (See id. (Illinois, Indiana, Nevada, Pennsylvania).)

In addition, although most countries have adopted regulations prohibiting children of varying ages from engaging in "hazardous" work activities, the precise definition of "hazardous" remains unclear. (See id.)

<sup>18</sup> It should be noted that John Roe I v. Bridgestone involved claims for the defendants' direct violations of international law, not for the defendant's aiding and abetting third parties' violations. The plaintiffs in that case had alleged that the defendants "own and control the plantation." 492 F. Supp. 2d at 990.

1 work "cutting, gathering, and drying" cocoa beans for twelve to 2 fourteen hours a day, six days a week. (FAC ¶¶ 57-59.) The plaintiffs 3 were between twelve and fourteen years old at the time they first began 4 working at the farms. (Id.)

5 Because Defendants have not disputed the adequacy of these 6 allegations, the Court assumes for present purposes that Plaintiffs' 7 allegations establish violations of universal, well-defined 8 international law norms prohibiting child labor.<sup>19</sup>

9 C. TORTURE

10 Torture is a well-established norm of international law that is 11 actionable under the Alien Tort Statute. See In re Marcos Human Rights 12 Litig., 25 F.3d 1467, 1475 (9th Cir. 1994) (collecting authorities); 13 Filartiga v. Pena-Irala, 630 F.2d 876, 880-84 (2d Cir. 1980); see also 14 Sosa, 542 U.S. at 732 (citing those cases with approval).

15 A helpful working definition of "torture" can be found in the 16 Torture Victim Protection Act:

17 the term 'torture' means any act, directed against an individual 18 in the offender's custody or physical control, by which severe 19 pain or suffering (other than pain or suffering arising only from 20 or inherent in, or incidental to, lawful sanctions), whether 21 physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on that individual 22 for such purposes as obtaining from that individual or a third 23 person information or a confession, punishing that individual for 24 an act that individual or a third person has committed or is 25 suspected of having committed, intimidating or coercing that 26 individual or a third person, or for any reason based on 27 discrimination of any kind[.]

28 <sup>19</sup> The Court notes, however, that Plaintiffs' allegations are readily distinguishable from the allegations at issue in John Roe I v. Bridgestone, which involved the employment of significantly younger children (six to ten years old, as opposed to twelve to fourteen in the present case) and contained specific factual allegations that they were not allowed to attend school and were forced to perform "back-breaking work that expose[d] them to dangerous chemicals and tools." See John Roe I v. Bridgestone, 492 F. Supp. 2d at 1021.

1 Torture Victim Protection Act, Pub. L. 102-256, 106 Stat. 73 (1992), §
2 3(b)(1), reprinted in 28 U.S.C.A. § 1350 note. In addition, the 3 Torture Victim Protection Act contains a state-action requirement, such 4 that liability only exists if the act of torture is done "under actual 5 or apparent authority, or color of law, of any foreign nation." Id. at 6 § 2(a)(1).<sup>20</sup>

7 Plaintiffs allege that they were severely beaten and/or threatened 8 with severe beatings in order to prevent them from leaving the cocoa 9 plantations. Plaintiffs also allege that they were given inadequate 10 food, were forced to sleep in tightly-packed locked rooms, and were 11 threatened with being forced to drink urine. (FAC ¶¶ 57-59.)

12 The Court will assume for purposes of this motion that these 13 allegations are sufficient to state the basic elements of torture:
14 "severe pain or suffering" was "intentionally inflicted on" Plaintiffs 15 for the "purposes" of "punishing" Plaintiffs for acts that Plaintiffs 16 committed, and/or for the "purposes" of "intimidating or coercing" 17 Plaintiffs. Allegations of severe beatings, extended confinements, and 18 deprivation of food - causing both physical and mental injury - 19 generally constitute torture. See, e.g., Doe v. Qi, 349 F. Supp. 2d 20 1258, 1267-70, 1314-18 (N.D. Cal. 2004) (collecting cases).<sup>21</sup>

21 To the extent that the international law definition of torture 22

23 <sup>20</sup> This definition of torture is nearly identical, word-for-word, as 24 the leading international law definition found in the Convention 25 Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or 26 Punishment, art. 1(1), S. Treaty Doc. No. 100-20 (1988), 1465
U.N.T.S. 113, reprinted in 23 I.L.M. 1027 (1984), modified in 24
I.L.M. 535 (1985).

27 <sup>21</sup> That said, in light of Twombly and Iqbal, the Court has serious 28 concerns about the adequacy of the factual details contained in Plaintiffs' First Amended Complaint.

1 contains additional requirements (most importantly, the state-action
2 requirement), the Court discusses these issues at greater length infra.

3 D. CRUEL, INHUMAN, AND DEGRADING TREATMENT

4 "Cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment is defined 5 as acts which inflict mental or physical suffering, anguish, 6 humiliation, fear and debasement, which fall short of torture." Sarei 7 v. Rio Tinto PLC, 650 F. Supp. 2d 1004, 1029 (C.D. Cal. 2009) (quoting
8 Aldana v. Del Monte Fresh Produce, N.A., Inc., 452 F.3d 1284, 1285 n.1
9 (11th Cir. 2005) (Barkett, J., dissenting)), appeal pending, Nos.
10 02-56256, 02-56390, 09-56381 (9th Cir.). "The principal difference 11 between torture and [cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment] is 'the 12 intensity of the suffering inflicted.'" Id. (quoting Restatement 13 (Third) of Foreign Relations, § 702 n.5).

14 The prevailing view in the caselaw is that "cruel, inhuman, and 15 degrading treatment" generally constitutes an actionable international 16 law norm under Sosa. See, e.g., Sarei, 650 F. Supp. 2d at 1028-29
17 (collecting cases). However, as with child labor, there is a general 18 consensus that only some types of activities constitute cruel, inhuman, 19 and degrading treatment; and the central question is whether the 20 "specific conduct at issue" fits within that core norm. Id. at 1029-30 21 ("Because multiple elements of plaintiffs' CIDT claim do not involve 22 conduct that has been universally condemned as cruel, inhuman, or 23 degrading, the court concludes that the specific CIDT claim plaintiffs 24 assert does not exclusively involve matters of universal concern."); 25 Bowoto, 557 F. Supp. 2d at 1093-94; John Roe I v. Bridgestone, 492 F.
26 Supp. 2d at 1023-24 (recognizing cruel, inhuman, and degrading 27 treatment as actionable norm under customary international law, but 28

1 holding that "exploitative labor practices" do not violate those 2 norms); Doe v. Qi, 349 F. Supp. 2d at 1321-25.

3 As with the allegations of torture, the Court assumes for purposes
4 of this Order that Plaintiffs have adequately alleged cruel, inhuman, 5 or degrading treatment with respect to Defendants' alleged severe 6 beatings, extended confinements, and deprivation of food.

8 VI. LEGAL STANDARD REGARDING LIABILITY FOR AIDING AND ABETTING
9 VIOLATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

10 A. INTRODUCTION

11 There is an extensive body of precedent supporting aiding and 12 abetting-liability for violations of international law. Aiding and 13 abetting liability is prominent in the Nuremberg Tribunals, the 14 International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda 15 (hereinafter "ICTY" and "ICTR"), and the Rome Statute of the 16 International Criminal Court. See Khulumani v. Barclay Nat. Bank Ltd., 17 504 F.3d 254, 270 (2d Cir. 2007) (Katzmann, J., concurring) ("the 18 individual responsibility of a defendant who aids and abets a violation 19 of international law . . . has been frequently invoked in international 20 law instruments as an accepted mode of liability [and] has been 21 repeatedly recognized in numerous international treaties.").

22 International conventions such as the Supplementary Convention on the 23 Abolition of Slavery require the punishment of aiders and abettors.
24 See Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave 25 Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery, Sept. 7,

1 1956, 18 U.S.T. 3201, 226 U.N.T.S. 3.<sup>22</sup> Similarly, domestic criminal 2 law provides for aiding and abetting liability, see 18 U.S.C. § 2, and 3 has done so for centuries with respect to aiding and abetting 4 particular violations of international law such as piracy.<sup>23</sup> There is 5 little doubt, then, that certain Alien Tort Statute defendants may 6 potentially be held liable under an aiding and abetting theory of 7 liability.

8 B. WHICH SOURCE OF LAW TO APPLY?

9 The key question is whether to examine domestic law or 10 international law to derive the proper legal standard for determining 11 aiding and abetting liability. Plaintiffs assert that the proper 12 source of aiding and abetting liability is domestic law. Defendants

14 <sup>22</sup> The Convention requires member states to prohibit "being accessory" 15 to and "being a party to a conspiracy to accomplish" acts including 16 "enslaving another person" and separating a child from his parents
"with a view to the exploitation of the child[']s . . . labour." 18 U.S.T. 3201, arts. 1(d), 6(1)-(2).

17 <sup>23</sup> In light of Sosa's emphasis on Blackstone and the law of piracy, it 18 is interesting to note the centuries-old domestic statutory 19 provisions in England and the United States that criminalized aiding 20 and abetting piracy. See United States v. Palmer, 16 U.S. 610, 629 21 (1818) (discussing Apr. 30, 1790 Act providing for punishment by 22 death for those who "knowingly and wittingly aid and assist, procure, 23 command, counsel, or advise, any person or persons, to do or commit 24 any murder, robbery, or other piracy," or who after the fact "furnish 25 aid to those by whom the crime has been perpetrated") (citing 1 Stat.
26 112, 113-14, §§ 10-11); Blackstone, 4 Commentaries, Ch. 5 (discussing 27 statute of 2 Hen. V. St. 1, ch. 6, by which the "breaking of truce 28 and safe-conduct, or abetting and receiving the truce breakers, was (in affirmance and support of the law of nations) declared to be high treason against the crown and dignity of the king," and statutes of 11 & 12 Wm. III., ch. 7 and 8 Geo. I., ch. 24, which established criminal liability for "conspiring" to commit piracy and for "trading with known pirates, or furnishing them with stores or ammunition, or fitting out any vessel for that purpose, or in any wise consulting, combining, confederating, or corresponding with them," and further establishing that "all accessories to piracy, are declared to be principal pirates, and felons without benefit of clergy").

1 assert that international law is the proper source.

2       Ultimately, the Court agrees with and adopts the Second Circuit's 3 resolution of this question: international law provides the appropriate 4 definition of aiding and abetting liability. See Presbyterian Church
5 of Sudan v. Talisman Energy, Inc., 582 F.3d 244, 258-59 (2d Cir. 2009)
6 (discussing Khulumani v. Barclay Nat. Bank Ltd., 504 F.3d 254 (2d Cir.
7 2007)). The central principles are as follows.

8       The Supreme Court in Sosa repeatedly insisted that United States 9 courts must follow international law in defining the nature of 10 violative acts and the scope of liability. See, e.g., Sosa, 542 U.S.
11 at 732 ("federal courts should not recognize private claims under 12 federal common law for violations of any international law norm with 13 less definite content and acceptance among civilized nations than the 14 historical paradigms familiar when § 1350 was enacted."). Though 15 Plaintiffs argue that federal law should be used to fill the gaps where 16 international law is silent, it is clear that international law 17 provides sufficiently well-established norms of secondary liability to 18 satisfy Sosa's requirement of norms containing "definite content [that 19 are] accept[ed] among civilized nations." See id. There is simply no 20 reason to alter the well-defined scope of international law by 21 introducing domestic law into the Alien Tort Statute.

22       It is clear from the authorities identified by the parties and 23 discussed at greater length infra that international law recognizes 24 aiding and abetting liability. Because the act of aiding and abetting 25 a human rights violation constitutes an independent violation of 26 international law, the Court concludes that international law is the 27 appropriate source of law under Sosa.

1           C.     WHAT IS THE SCOPE OF AIDING AND ABETTING LIABILITY UNDER 2           INTERNATIONAL LAW?

3           There is little doubt that aiding and abetting liability is a part 4 of international law. Aiding and abetting liability is prominent in 5 the Nuremberg Tribunals,<sup>24</sup> the International Criminal Tribunals for the 6 Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda,<sup>25</sup> and the Statute of the International 7 Criminal Court. See generally Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 270 (Katzmann, 8 J., concurring).

9           Although there are various formulations of the proper standard of 10 aiding and abetting liability in international law, it is important to 11 remember Sosa's instruction that norms are only actionable if they are 12 universally recognized and defined with specificity. For example, as 13 noted by Justice Story in United States v. Smith, 18 U.S. 153, 161 14

15       <sup>24</sup> The London Charter that created the Nuremberg Tribunals provided 16 for secondary as well as primary liability for the atrocities 17 committed by the Axis Powers during the Second World War. Article 18 Six provided that "Leaders, organizers, instigators and accomplices 19 participating in the formulation or execution of a common plan or 20 conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing crimes [crimes against 21 peace, war crimes, and crimes against humanity] are responsible for all acts performed by any persons in execution of such plan."
Agreement for the Prosecution and Punishment of Major War Criminals of the European Axis, and Establishing the Charter of the International Military Tribunal, Aug. 8, 1945, art. 6, 82 U.N.T.S.
279 (hereinafter "London Charter").

22       <sup>25</sup> ICTY and ICTR allow for aiding and abetting liability by virtue of 23 their enabling statutes, which create liability for those who have 24 "planned, instigated, ordered, committed, or otherwise aided and 25 abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime."
26 Statute of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, art.
27 7, adopted May 25, 1993, S.C. Res. 827, U.N. Doc. S/RES/827
28 (hereinafter "ICTY Statute"); Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, art. 6, adopted Nov. 8, 1994, S.C. Res. 955,
U.N. Doc. S/RES/955 (hereinafter "ICTR Statute"). The ICTY and ICTR Statutes were drafted and approved by the Security Council of the United Nations. See Presbyterian Church of Sudan v. Talisman Energy, Inc., 374 F. Supp. 2d 331, 338 (S.D.N.Y. 2005).

1 (1820), "whatever may be the diversity of definitions, . . . all 2 writers concur, in holding, that robbery or forcible depredations upon 3 the sea, animo furandi [with the intention to steal] is piracy."<sup>26</sup> In 4 other words, where there are a variety of formulations, the court 5 should look to the formulation that is agreed upon by all - a lowest 6 common denominator or a common "core definition" of the norm.
7 See Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 277 n.12 (Katzmann, J., concurring). This 8 approach has been adopted by the Ninth Circuit in Abagninin v. AMVAC 9 Chem. Corp., 545 F.3d 733, 738-40 (9th Cir. 2008), which concluded that 10 customary international law imposes a specific intent standard for 11 genocide, despite an alternative "knowledge" standard established by 12 one particular treaty. In addition, this lowest common denominator 13 approach has been adopted by other federal courts dealing with the 14 question of aiding and abetting liability. See Presbyterian Church of 15 Sudan, 582 F.3d at 259 (concluding that the relevant "standard has been 16 largely upheld in the modern era, with only sporadic forays in the 17 direction of a [different] standard.").

18 1. ACTUS REUS

19 With respect to the actus reus element of the violation, the 20 Court, having examined the applicable authorities, believes that the 21 International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia has 22 accurately and concisely restated the governing international law rule:

23 an aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to 24 assist, encourage, or lend moral support to the perpetration of a 25 certain specific crime, which have a substantial effect on the 26 perpetration of the crime. The actus reus need not serve as condition precedent for the crime and may occur before, during, or after the principal crime has been perpetrated.

27 <sup>26</sup> The Smith Court's analysis of piracy was cited with approval in 28 Sosa, 542 U.S. at 732.

1 Prosecutor v. Blagojevic, No. IT-02-60-A, at ¶ 127 (ICTY Appeals
2 Chamber, May 9, 2007) (collecting cases) (citations and footnotes
3 omitted, emphasis added), available at [http://www.icty.org/x/cases/
4 blagojevic\_jokic/acjug/en/blajok-jud070509.pdf](http://www.icty.org/x/cases/blagojevic_jokic/acjug/en/blajok-jud070509.pdf).<sup>27</sup> This formulation 5 requires that the defendant must do something more than “[a]iding a 6 criminal” generally - the defendant must aid the commission of a 7 specific crime. As other District Courts have aptly explained, 8 “[a]iding a criminal ‘is not the same thing as aiding and abetting his 9 or her alleged human rights abuses.’” In re South African Apartheid 10 Litig., 617 F. Supp. 2d 228, 257 (S.D.N.Y. 2009) (emphasis added) 11 (quoting Mastafa v. Australian Wheat Bd. Ltd., No. 07 Civ. 7955(GEL), 12 2008 WL 4378443, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 25, 2008)). In other words, the 13 aider and abettor’s assistance must bear a causative relationship to 14 the specific wrongful conduct committed by the principal. Id. The 15

16 17 <sup>27</sup> Plaintiffs argue that the actus reus element does not require that 18 the acts are “specifically directed” to a “certain specific crime.” 19 But as Plaintiffs concede (see 8/6/09 Opp. at 12), the 20 Blagojevic tribunal carefully explained that international law has 21 always required that the acts be “specifically directed” to assist in 22 a “certain specific crime”; however, the tribunal also noted that 23 some courts have implicitly concluded that this standard was 24 satisfied when the facts showed that the actor’s conduct was 25 undertaken knowingly and had a “substantial effect on the 26 perpetration of the crime.” Blagojevic, at ¶¶ 189, 193. The Court 27 agrees with the Blagojevic tribunal’s summary of the international 28 caselaw, which unanimously supports the conclusion that the actus reus of aiding and abetting in international law requires that the assistance is “specifically directed” to a “certain specific crime.” As explained in Blagojevic, alternative formulations of this standard generally constitute dictum that is not uniformly accepted. The alternative formulations therefore fail to satisfy Sosa’s requirement that the international law norm must be universally accepted. See Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 582 F.3d at 259 (adopting approach of looking to common core definition to determine appropriate choice among competing articulations of a standard); Abagninin, 545 F.3d at 738-40 (same).

1 assistance need not necessarily constitute a "but-for" cause or 2 conditio sine qua non, but it must have an actual effect on the 3 principal's criminal act. Id.

4 This definition of the actus reus standard is consistent with the 5 caselaw summarized infra and, notably, retains a meaningful and clear 6 distinction between aiding and abetting liability and conspiracy/joint 7 criminal enterprise liability. As explained by the International 8 Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, the distinctions between 9 aiding and abetting and joint criminal enterprise are as follows:

10 Participation in a joint criminal enterprise is a form of 11 "commission" [of a crime] under Article 7(1) of the [ICTY] 12 Statute. The participant therein is liable as a co-perpetrator of 13 the crime(s). Aiding and abetting the commission of a crime is 14 usually considered to incur a lesser degree of individual criminal 15 responsibility than committing a crime. In the context of a crime 16 committed by several co-perpetrators in a joint criminal 17 enterprise, the aider and abettor is always an accessory to these 18 co-perpetrators, although the co-perpetrators may not even know of 19 the aider and abettor's contribution. Differences exist in 20 relation to the actus reus as well as to the mens rea requirements 21 between both forms of individual criminal responsibility:

22 (i) The aider and abettor carries out acts specifically 23 directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the 24 perpetration of a certain specific crime (murder, extermination, 25 rape, torture, wanton destruction of civilian property, etc.), and 26 this support has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the 27 crime. By contrast, it is sufficient for a participant in a joint 28 criminal enterprise to perform acts that in some way are directed to the furtherance of the common design.

(ii) In the case of aiding and abetting, the requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal. By contrast, in the case of participation in a joint criminal enterprise, i.e. as a co-perpetrator, the requisite mens rea is intent to pursue a common purpose.

Vasiljevic, 2004 WL 2781932, at ¶ 102. In other words, the aider and abettor must do something more than commit acts that "in some way" tenuously "further[] . . . the common design" of a criminal organization; that actus reus standard applies only to co-conspirators who knowingly and actively join in the criminal conspiracy and share

1 its criminal purpose. To establish aiding and abetting liability, 2 generalized assistance is not enough: the assistance must be 3 "specifically directed" - i.e., bear a direct causative relationship - 4 to a specific wrongful act, and the assistance must have a substantial 5 effect on that wrongful act. Blagojevic, at ¶ 127.

6 This aiding and abetting actus reus standard necessarily "requires 7 a fact-based inquiry" that is context-specific. See id. at ¶ 134.
8 However, one important issue must be noted at the outset of the 9 discussion. There is a great deal of uncertainty about the actus reus 10 of "tacit approval and encouragement" - a theory of liability that, 11 according to Plaintiffs, dates back to Nuremberg-era precedents such as 12 The Synagogue Case and United States v. Ohlendorf ("The Einsatzgruppen 13 Case"), in 4 Trials of War Criminals Before the Nuremberg Military 14 Tribunals Under Control Council Law No. 10 ("T.W.C."), at 570-72 15 (William S. Hein & Co., Inc. 1997). To the extent this form of 16 liability even exists, the modern caselaw supports liability only where 17 the defendant has "a combination of a position of authority and 18 physical presence at the crime scene[, which] allows the inference that 19 non-interference by the accused actually amounted to tacit approval and 20 encouragement." Prosecutor v. Oric, No. IT-03-68-A, at ¶ 42 (ICTY 21 Appeals Chamber, July 3, 2008), available at 2008 WL 6930198. As with 22 all aiding and abetting, it must be shown that the encouragement was 23 "substantial" - which necessarily requires that the "principal 24 perpetrators [were] aware of it," because otherwise, the support and 25 encouragement would not have had any effect (let alone a substantial 26 one) on the principal offense. Prosecutor v. Brdjanin, No. IT-99-36-A, 27 at ¶ 277 (ICTY Appeals Chamber, April 3 2007), available at 2007 WL 28

1 1826003. The specific situations in which courts have imposed such 2 liability are identified infra.

3 2. MENS REA

4 The Court is aware that there is an ongoing debate among courts, 5 litigants, and commentators regarding the proper definition of aiding 6 and abetting liability. See, e.g., Pet'n for Writ of Cert., 7 Presbyterian Church of Sudan v. Talisman Energy, Inc., No. 09-1262, 8 2010 WL 1602093, at *27-33 (Apr. 15, 2010) (collecting cases). The 9 Court concurs with the five judges on the Second Circuit who have 10 concluded that the appropriate mens rea for aiding and abetting 11 violations of international law requires that the defendant act with 12 "the purpose of facilitating the commission of that crime." Khulumani, 13 504 F.3d at 277 (Katzmann, J., concurring); see also Presbyterian 14 Church of Sudan, 582 F.3d at 259 (adopting Judge Katzmann's 15 formulation); Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 332-33 (Korman, J., concurring in 16 relevant part). As the Second Circuit explained in its recent 17 Presbyterian Church of Sudan decision, a plaintiff must show that the 18 defendant acted with "purpose rather than knowledge alone" because only 19 a "purpose" standard "has the requisite 'acceptance among civilized 20 nations'" to satisfy Sosa's stringent requirements. Presbyterian 21 Church of Sudan, 582 F.3d at 259 (quoting Sosa, 542 U.S. at 732). The 22 less-stringent "knowledge" standard, although it has often been 23 invoked, has not obtained universal recognition and acceptance. See 24 generally Prosecutor v. Furundzija, IT-95-17/1-T, at ¶¶ 190-249 (ICTY 25 Trial Chamber, Dec. 10, 1998) (surveying international caselaw and 26 adopting "knowledge" mens rea standard), reprinted in 38 I.L.M. 317 27 (1999), aff'd, No. IT-95-17/1-A (ICTY Appeals Chamber, July 21, 2000), 28

1 available at 2000 WL 34467822. As such, the "knowledge" standard is an 2 improper basis for bringing an Alien Tort Statute action.

3 However, to the extent that a "knowledge" mens rea standard 4 applies (a conclusion that the Court rejects), the Court believes that 5 the proper articulation of the aiding and abetting standard would be 6 the formulation adopted by the Appeals Chambers of the International 7 Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda: "the requisite 8 mental element of aiding and abetting is knowledge that the acts 9 performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal 10 perpetrator." Blagojevic, at ¶ 127 (collecting cases) (citations and 11 footnotes omitted, emphasis added); see also Prosecutor v. Ntagerura, 12 No. ICTR-99-46-A, at ¶ 370 (ICTR Appeals Chamber, July 2006) (same), 13 available at 2006 WL 4724776; Prosecutor v. Blaskic, No. IT-95-14-A, at 14 ¶ 45 (ICTY Appeals Chamber, July 2004) (same), available at 2004 WL
15 2781930; Prosecutor v. Vasiljevic, No. IT-98-32-A, at ¶ 102 (ICTY 16 Appeals Chamber, Feb. 25, 2004) (same), available at 2004 WL 2781932.
17 To the extent that the International Criminal Tribunals for the former 18 Yugoslavia and Rwanda have occasionally adopted a less stringent 19 standard, see, e.g., Mrksic, at ¶ 159; Furundzija, 38 I.L.M. 317 at ¶ 20 249, the Court believes that the standard articulated in Blagojevic, 21 Ntagerura, Blaskic, and Vasiljevic best reflects the relevant caselaw 22 discussed infra.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>28</sup> The Court also notes that, in the present context, the specific articulation of the mens rea standard is not necessarily determinative. At the pleading stage, the "purpose" standard is similar to the Blagojevic tribunal's "knowledge that the acts assist a specific crime" standard. A defendant's purposeful intent might potentially be inferred from factual allegations that establish that a defendant knew his action would substantially assist a certain specific crime (consistent with the actus reus principles articulated

1           Accordingly, to the extent that the "purpose" specific intent mens 2 rea standard does not apply and a "knowledge" general intent mens rea
3 standard does apply, the Court would apply the dominant approach taken 4 in the recent international appellate tribunal decisions. This 5 approach requires that the aider and abettor must know or have reason 6 to know of the relationship between his conduct and the wrongful acts.
7 See Oric, 2008 WL 6930198, at ¶ 45. It is not enough, as explained by 8 the Oric appeals tribunal, that the aider and abetter knew or had 9 reason to know that crimes were being committed - the aider and abetter 10 must know or have reason to know that his own acts or omissions 11 "assisted in the crimes." Id. at ¶¶ 43, 45 & n.104.

12           That said, the Court concludes that the "purpose" mens rea
13 standard is the proper standard to use in Alien Tort Statute 14 litigation. The less-stringent "knowledge" standard that was 15 originally synthesized by the International Criminal Tribunal for the 16 former Yugoslavia in Furundzija rests on a number of premises that, 17 while perhaps acceptable under that Tribunal's enacting authority, fail 18 to satisfy the requirements set forth by the Supreme Court in Sosa.

19           The appropriateness of the "purpose" standard is supported by the 20 following authorities. As an initial matter, it is particularly 21 notable that the International Court of Justice - the central expositor 22 of international law, see Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations, § 23 103 cmt. (b) ("The judgments and opinions of the International Court of 24 Justice are accorded great weight") - recently declined to decide 25

26           supra and developed further infra). In light of this consideration, 27 the Court believes that the best resolution of the present case can 28 be obtained by way of analogy to the facts of existing international-law precedents. The relevant cases are discussed at length infra.

1 whether the crime of aiding and abetting genocide requires that the 2 aider and abettor share the perpetrator's criminal intent or merely 3 know of the perpetrator's criminal intent. Application of the 4 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide 5 (Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro), 2007 I.C.J. No. 91, 6 at ¶ 421 ("the question arises whether complicity presupposes that the 7 accomplice shares the specific intent (dolus specialis) of the 8 principal perpetrator"), available at http://www.icj-cij.org/docket/
9 files/91/13685.pdf. The fact that the International Court of Justice 10 refrained from addressing this question supports the conclusion that 11 the appropriate definition remains subject to reasonable debate.<sup>29</sup> In 12 light of Sosa, any doubts about the standard should be resolved in 13 favor of the most stringent version. See, e.g., Presbyterian Church of 14 Sudan, 582 F.3d at 259 (adopting approach of looking to common core 15 definition to determine appropriate choice among competing

17 <sup>29</sup> It is true that the International Court of Justice was only 18 addressing allegations regarding aiding and abetting the crime of 19 genocide, which is not at issue in the present case. See Khulumani, 20 504 F.3d at 332 (Korman, J., concurring) (noting that Sosa "requires 21 an analysis of the particular norm the defendant is accused of 22 violating to determine whether a private party may be held 23 responsible as an aider and abettor") (emphasis added). However, the 24 Court believes that the International Court of Justice's refusal to 25 address the question undermines the analysis and conclusions reached 26 by the ad hoc International Criminal Tribunals both with respect to 27 genocide cases specifically, see, e.g., Prosecutor v. Ntakirutimana, 28 ICTR-96-10-A, ICTR-96-17-A, at ¶¶ 500-01 & nn. 855-56 (ICTR Appeals Chamber Dec. 13, 2004) (collecting cases), available at 2004 WL 2981767, and all cases discussing the aiding and abetting mens rea more generally. The International Court of Justice's refusal to adopt the ad hoc tribunals' conclusions provides compelling evidence of the tribunals' inadequacies as precedents for Alien Tort Statute litigation, an issue that is thoroughly and persuasively addressed in the concurring opinions in Khulumani. See Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 278-79 (Katzmann, J., concurring); id. at 336-37 (Korman, J., concurring).

1 articulations of a standard); Abagninin, 545 F.3d at 738-40 (same).

2 The Court notes that a Nuremberg-era precedent supports the view 3 that the aider and abetter must act with the purpose of aiding the 4 principal offender. In the Hechingen case, a number of German citizens 5 were accused of aiding and abetting the deportation of the Jewish 6 population of two German towns. See The Hechingen and Haigerloch Case, 7 translated in Modes of Participation in Crimes Against Humanity, 7 J.
8 Int'l Crim. Just. 131, 132 (2009). The Gestapo had issued orders for 9 the towns' Jewish populations to be deported and for their persons and 10 luggage to be searched. Id. Two of the defendants, "Ho." and "K.," 11 had participated in the searches and had collected the victims' jewelry 12 to give to the town's mayor. Id. at 144-45. The trial court held that 13 on account of these acts the defendants were guilty as accessories of 14 participating "in a persecution on racial grounds and thus in a crime 15 against humanity." Id. at 145. The trial court's conclusion was based 16 on its view that the "knowledge" mens rea standard applied: "Intent as 17 an accessory requires, first, that the accused knew what act he was 18 furthering by his participation; he must have been aware that the 19 actions ordered from him by the Gestapo served persecution on racial 20 grounds. . . . [And] second, that the accused knew that through his 21 participation he was furthering the principal act." Id. at 139.

22 This conclusion was reversed on appeal. The appellate court 23 explained that the underlying offense, "[p]ersecution on political, 24 racial and religious grounds," may only be committed if the defendant 25 "acted out of an inhumane mindset, derived from a politically, racially 26 or religiously determined ideology." Id. at 150. The court explained 27 that the aider and abettor must share this criminal intent - i.e., must 28

1 act with the intention of bringing about the underlying crime: “[t]he 2 accessory [] to a crime against humanity is ‘regarded as guilty of a 3 crime against humanity, without regard to the capacity in which he 4 acted.’ From this complete equation with the perpetrator it follows 5 that the accessory must have acted from the same mindset as the 6 perpetrator himself, that is, from an inhumane mindset and in 7 persecutions under politically, racially or religiously determined 8 ideologies.” Id. at 150. The court then concluded that “[t]he accused 9 Ho. and K. were, according to the [trial court’s] findings, involved 10 only in a subordinate manner in the deportations. In doing so they 11 behaved particularly leniently and sympathetically, i.e. humanely[ 12 toward the victims]. Their attitudes were not anti-Jewish. Moreover, 13 as the [trial court] judgment also explicitly finds, they did not have 14 an awareness of the illegality of what they were doing.” Id. at 151.
15 Accordingly, the court of appeal reversed their convictions. Id.

16 In light of the Hechingen case - which has received surprisingly 17 little attention from courts and litigants under the Alien Tort 18 Statute, cf. Brief of Amici Curiae International Law Scholars William 19 Aceves, et al., in support of Pet’n for Writ of Cert., Presbyterian 20 Church of Sudan v. Talisman Energy, Inc., No. 09-1262, 2010 WL 1787371, 21 at *7 & n.4 (Apr. 30, 2010) (arguing that “a single deviation from a 22 long line of precedent does not modify customary international law”) – 23 the Court is compelled to conclude that the “purpose” mens rea standard 24 is the correct standard for Alien Tort Statute purposes and the 25 Furundzija “knowledge” standard is not. The Hechingen precedent was 26 simply brushed aside by the ICTY Trial Chamber in Furundzija, see 38 27 I.L.M. 317, at ¶ 248 (“the high standard proposed by [Hechingen] is not 28

1 reflected in the other cases"). But in light of Sosa, this Court is 2 not in a position to ignore international precedent so easily.<sup>30</sup>

3 Notably, this conclusion is further supported by the Rome Statute 4 of the International Criminal Court, July 17, 1998, 2187 U.N.T.S. 90, 5 which "has been signed by 139 countries and ratified by 105, including 6 most of the mature democracies of the world," Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 7 333 (Korman, J., concurring), and which "by and large may be taken as 8 constituting an authoritative expression of the legal views of a great 9 number of States." Furundzija, 38 I.L.M. 317, at ¶ 227. Importantly, 10 the Rome Statute, unlike many other international law sources, 11 specifically and clearly "articulates the mens rea required for aiding 12 and abetting liability" and harmonizes all of the relevant caselaw from 13 international tribunals. Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 275 (Katzmann, J., 14 concurring); cf. Abagninin, 545 F.3d at 738-40 (rejecting plaintiffs' 15 reliance on Rome Statute with respect to genocide because Rome 16 Statute's definition of genocide conflicted with definition that was 17 uniformly adopted by other authorities).

18 The Rome Statute provides that "a person shall be criminally 19 responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the 20 jurisdiction of the Court<sup>31</sup> if that person[,] . . . [f]or the purpose of 21

---

22 <sup>30</sup> It might be argued that the Hechingen court's opinion was directed 23 toward "joint criminal enterprise" (i.e., conspiracy) liability 24 rather than aiding and abetting liability. But this argument is 25 belied by the fact that the Hechingen court stated that the 26 defendants were accused of being an "accessory [] to a crime against 27 humanity." The Hechingen and Haigerloch Case, 7 J. Int'l Crim. Just.
28 at 150 (emphasis added).

crimes of concern to the international community as a whole," art.
5(1), namely, genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes, and aggression. "Crimes against humanity" include many of the claims at 1 facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise 2 assists in its commission or its attempted commission, including 3 providing the means for its commission." Article 25(3)(c) (emphasis 4 added). The "purpose" mens rea standard should be contrasted with the 5 treaty's general "intent and knowledge" standard, art. 30(1),<sup>32</sup> the 6 criminal negligence standard applicable to military commanders' 7 liability for subordinates' actions, art. 28(a),<sup>33</sup> the criminal 8 recklessness standard applicable to other superiors for their 13 physical liberty, and torture. Art. 7(1)(c),(e),(f).

14 <sup>32</sup> Article 30 provides:

15 1. Unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally 16 responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the 17 jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are 18 committed with intent and knowledge.

19 2. For the purposes of this article, a person has intent where: 20 (a) In relation to conduct, that person means to engage in the 21 conduct;

22 (b) In relation to a consequence, that person means to cause 23 that consequence or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary 24 course of events.

25 3. For the purposes of this article, "knowledge" means awareness 26 that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the 27 ordinary course of events. "Know" and "knowingly" shall be 28 construed accordingly.

A military commander or person effectively acting as a military commander shall be criminally responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed by forces under his or her effective command and control, or effective authority and control as the case may be, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such forces, where:

(i) That military commander or person either knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes; and

(ii) That military commander or person failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution.

1 subordinates' actions, art. 28(b),<sup>34</sup> and the intent and knowledge 2 standard applicable to conspirators (that is, members of "groups acting 3 with a common purpose").<sup>35</sup> It is also noteworthy that the "purpose"
4 standard "was borrowed from the Model Penal Code of the American Law 5 Institute and generally implies a specific subjective requirement 6 stricter than knowledge." See International Commission of Jurists, 7 Expert Legal Panel on Corporate Complicity in International Crimes, 2

12 <sup>34</sup> Article 28(b) provides:

13 With respect to superior and subordinate relationships not 14 described in paragraph (a), a superior shall be criminally 15 responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court 16 committed by subordinates under his or her effective authority 17 and control, as a result of his or her failure to exercise 18 control properly over such subordinates, where:
19 (i) The superior either knew, or consciously disregarded 20 information which clearly indicated, that the subordinates were 21 committing or about to commit such crimes; 22 (ii) The crimes concerned activities that were within the 23 effective responsibility and control of the superior; and 24 (iii) The superior failed to take all necessary and reasonable 25 measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their 26 commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities 27 for investigation and prosecution.
28

<sup>35</sup> Article 25(3)(d) provides:

22 [A] person shall be criminally responsible and liable for 23 punishment for a crime with the jurisdiction of the Court if 24 that person . . . [i]n any other way contributes to the 25 commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of 26 persons acting with a common purpose. Such contribution shall 27 be intentional and shall either:
28 (i) Be made with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; or
(ii) Be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime.

1 Much like the Nuremberg-era Hechingen case, the Rome Statute's 2 "purpose" standard, was largely ignored by the Furundzija tribunal.
3 The Furundzija tribunal cited Article 30 of the Rome Statute for the 4 proposition that "knowledge" is the default mens rea for violations of 5 human rights law, and wholly failed to mention the more specific 6 "purpose" standard set forth for aiding and abetting liability under 7 Article 25 of the Rome Statute. See Furundzija, 38 I.L.M. 317, at ¶ 8 244 & n.266; Rome Statute, at art. 25(3)(c) (establishing aiding and 9 abetting liability where defendant acts "[f]or the purpose of 10 facilitating the commission of" the principal offense) (emphasis 11 added). Yet as the Furundzija court recognized, "[i]n many areas the 12 [Rome] Statute may be regarded as indicative of the legal views, i.e.
13 opinio juris of a great number of States." Furundzija, 38 I.L.M. 317, 14 at ¶ 227; see also Prosecutor v. Tadic, No. IT-94-1-A, at ¶ 223 & n.282
15 (ICTY Appeals Chamber, July 15, 1999) (same), available at 1999 WL
16 33918295. The Rome Statute's "purpose" standard must be given great 17 weight. It should be noted as well that the Rome Statute's standard is 18 not a lone outlier: the same articulation appears in the United 19 Nations's regulations governing human rights tribunals in East Timor.
20 See United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor, "On the 21 Establishment of Panels with Exclusive Jurisdiction Over Serious 22 Criminal Offenses," § 14.3(c), UNTAET Reg. NO. 2000/15 (June 6, 2000), 23 available at http://www.un.org/en/peacekeeping/missions/past/etimor/24 untaetR/Reg0015E.pdf.

25 Some (including Plaintiffs) have argued that the Rome Statute does 26 not abrogate prior customary international law. (See 2/23/09 Opp. at 27 13 n.16.) However, this argument rests in part on a misreading of the 28

1 Rome Statute itself. This argument rests on Article 10 of the Statute, 2 which provides that “[n]othing in this Part shall be interpreted as 3 limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of 4 international law for purposes other than this Statute.” Based on this 5 provision, Plaintiffs argue that the Rome Statute does not override 6 international caselaw to the contrary. But Article 10 only establishes 7 that nothing “in this Part” affects existing customary international 8 law. Rome Statute, art. 10 (emphasis added). Article 10 appears in 9 Part II, which governs “Jurisdiction, admissibility and applicable 10 law.” On the other hand, Article 25, which establishes the rules 11 regarding individual criminal responsibility (including aiding and 12 abetting liability), appears in Part III of the Treaty, under the 13 heading “General principles of criminal law.” See Rome Statute, arts.
14 22-33 (“Part III”); see also Tadic, 1999 WL 33918295, at ¶ 223 n.282 15 (making same observation). As such, Article 10 does not apply to the 16 present analysis, and it is therefore appropriate that the Rome 17 Statute’s articulation of the relevant mens rea standard – which has 18 been approved by the majority of nations in the world – should prevail 19 over conflicting international caselaw.<sup>36</sup>

20 Accordingly, in light of Sosa’s requirement that international law 21 norms must be “accepted by the civilized world” and “defined with a 22 specificity comparable to” the eighteenth-century norms recognized by 23 Blackstone, Sosa, 542 U.S. at 725, the Court concludes that it is 24 appropriate to adopt the “purpose” mens rea standard rather than the 25

---

26 <sup>36</sup> In any event, as discussed throughout this Order, the Court 27 concludes that, even if the Rome Statute is not determinative, only 28 the “purpose” standard has achieved the requisite universal consensus to satisfy Sosa.

1 "knowledge" standard. See Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 582 F.3d at 2 259; Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 277 (Katzmann, J., concurring), 332-33
3 (Korman, J., concurring in relevant part).

4 3. SUMMARY OF AIDING AND ABETTING STANDARD

5 In sum, the Court concludes that the "core" definition of aiding 6 and abetting under international law requires the following. A person 7 is legally responsible for aiding and abetting a principal's wrongful 8 act when the aider and abettor (1) carries out acts that have a 9 substantial effect on the perpetration of a specific crime, and (2) 10 acts with the specific intent (i.e., for the purpose) of substantially 11 assisting the commission of that crime. See Presbyterian Church of 12 Sudan, 582 F.3d at 259 (articulating mens rea standard); Blagojevic, at 13 ¶ 127 (articulating actus reus standard). The Court concludes that the 14 relevant international caselaw, as construed in accordance with Sosa, 15 supports this articulation of the aiding and abetting standard.

16 D. NUREMBERG-ERA ILLUSTRATIONS OF AIDING AND ABETTING UNDER

18 The seminal cases discussing aiding and abetting liability were 19 issued following the Second World War by military tribunals operating 20 under the rules of the London Charter of the International Military 21 Tribunal at Nuremberg.<sup>37</sup>

23 <sup>37</sup> These cases were decided by British and American military tribunals 24 and by British, German, and French courts operating under the 25 standards set forth in the London Charter (which was incorporated by 26 reference into Control Council Law Number 10, which established and 27 governed the tribunals). See Flick v. Johnson, 174 F.2d 983, 984-86 28 (D.C. Cir. 1949) (dismissing a petition for habeas corpus and holding that the Control Council military tribunals were international rather than national judicial bodies); United States v. Flick ("The Flick

6 of money" to various SS enterprises that used slave labor and engaged 7 in the forced migration of non-German populations. Id. at 621. The 8 court held that it was insufficient that the defendant knew that the 9 loan would be used for criminal purposes by the SS enterprises. In 10 full, the court held:

11 The defendant is a banker and businessman of long experience 12 and is possessed of a keen and active mind. Bankers do not approve 13 or make loans in the number and amount made by the Dresdner Bank 14 without ascertaining, having, or obtaining information or 15 knowledge as to the purpose for which the loan is sought, and how 16 it is to be used. It is inconceivable to us that the defendant did 17 not possess that knowledge, and we find that he did.<sup>39</sup>

18 The real question is, is it a crime to make a loan, knowing 19 or having good reason to believe that the borrower will use the 20 legislative branch of the four Allied Powers now controlling Germany 21 (Control Council Law No. 10, 20 Dec. 1945). . . . The Tribunal

22 administers international law. It is not bound by the general 23 statutes of the United States.").

24 <sup>38</sup> It is unclear whether this case addresses the mens rea element of 25 aiding and abetting, see Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 582 F.3d at 26 259; Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 276 (Katzmann, J., concurring), 292-93
27 (Korman, J., concurring); or the actus reus element, see In re South 28 African Apartheid Litig., 617 F. Supp. 2d 228, 258, 260 (S.D.N.Y.
2009). Regardless of how the case is categorized, its holding is plainly relevant with respect to the facts of the present case, particularly when taken in conjunction with similar Nuremberg-era precedents.

<sup>39</sup> In a separate part of the opinion which held Rasche liable as a member of the SS, the tribunal concluded that Rasche "knew of the Germanization and resettlement program, knew that it was accomplished by forcible evacuation of the native populations and the settlement of ethnic Germans on the farms and homes confiscated from their former owners, and knew it was one of the SS programs and projects."
Ministries Case, 14 T.W.C. at 863.

1 funds in financing enterprises which are employed in using labor 2 in violation of either national or international law? Does he 3 stand in any different position than one who sells supplies or raw 4 materials to a builder building a house, knowing that the 5 structure will be used for an unlawful purpose? A bank sells money 6 or credit in the same manner as the merchandiser of any other 7 commodity. It does not become a partner in enterprise, and the 8 interest charged is merely the gross profit which the bank 9 realizes from the transaction, out of which it must deduct its 10 business costs, and from which it hopes to realize a net profit.
11 Loans or sale of commodities to be used in an unlawful enterprise 12 may well be condemned from a moral standpoint and reflect no 13 credit on the part of the lender or seller in either case, but the 14 transaction can hardly be said to be a crime. Our duty is to try 15 and punish those guilty of violating international law, and we are 16 not prepared to state that such loans constitute a violation of 17 that law, nor has our attention been drawn to any ruling to the 18 contrary.

19 Ministries Case, 14 T.W.C. at 622. The court accordingly acquitted 20 Rasche on the charge of aiding and abetting the SS's use of slave labor 21 and forced migration. Id. The court applied an identical analysis in 22 acquitting Rasche on an additional count of aiding and abetting 23 spoliation (plundering) activities by financing the German government's 24 "spoliation agencies." Id. at 784.

25 Rasche's case must be contrasted with the The Flick Case, 6 T.W.C.
26 at 1187. The defendants Flick and Steinbrinck were charged with being 27 "members of the Keppler Circle or Friends of Himmler, [and] with 28 knowledge of its criminal activities, contributed large sums to the financing of" the SS. Id. at 1190. Both Flick and Steinbrinck gratuitously donated 100,000 Reichsmarks annually to a "cultural" fund headed by Himmler (the head of the SS). Id. at 1219-20. The amount was "a substantial contribution" - "even [for] a wealthy man" - and plainly could have not have been used by Himmler solely for cultural purposes. Id. at 1220. The court explained that although Flick and Steinbrinck might have plausibly argued that they were initially ignorant of the true purposes of their donations, they continued making

1 donations well after "the criminal character of the SS . . . must have 2 been known" to them. Id. at 1220. The court held that Flick and 3 Steinbrinck had effectively given Himmler "a blank check," by which 4 "[h]is criminal organization was maintained." Id. at 1221. When a 5 donor provides extensive sums of money to a criminal organization 6 without asking for anything in return, it is "immaterial whether [the 7 money] was spent on salaries or for lethal gas." Id. The donor 8 becomes guilty of aiding and abetting the organization's criminal acts: 9 "One who knowingly by his influence and money contributes to the 10 support [of a criminal organization] must, under settled legal 11 principles, be deemed to be, if not a principal, certainly an accessory 12 to such crimes." Id. at 1217. Yet, at the same time, the tribunal 13 also found that Flick and Steinbrinck had not joined in the Nazi 14 Party's ideologies: "Defendants did not approve nor do they now condone 15 the atrocities of the SS." Id. at 1222. The defendants "were not 16 pronouncedly anti-Jewish," and in fact "[e]ach of them helped a number 17 of Jewish friends to obtain funds with which to emigrate." Id. The 18 tribunal found it "unthinkable that Steinbrinck, a V-boat commander who 19 risked his life and those of his crew to save survivors of a ship which 20 he had sunk, would willingly be a party to the slaughter of thousands 21 of defenseless persons." Id. Similarly Flick "knew in advance of the 22 plot on Hitler's life in July 1944, and sheltered one of the 23 conspirators." Id. It thus cannot reasonably be argued that the 24 defendants made their contributions for the purpose of assisting the 25 SS's acts.

26 The distinctions between Flick and Steinbrinck in The Flick Case 27 and Rasche in The Ministries Case are narrow, but important. Neither 28

1 Flick nor Steinbrinck acted with the purpose of furthering the Nazi 2 cause; indeed, the tribunal explicitly concluded that neither defendant 3 shared the German government's genocidal intent. However, by 4 gratuitously donating money to the Nazi party with full knowledge of 5 the fact that the money would be used to further the German 6 government's atrocities, they were found guilty as accessories to those 7 atrocities. In The Ministries Case, the banker Rasche also acted with 8 full knowledge that his loans would be used to benefit enterprises that 9 used slave-labor and engaged in forced migrations. 14 T.W.C. at 622, 10 863. But Rasche was acquitted. Regardless of whether the holdings are 11 categorized as turning on the defendant's actus reus or the mens rea,<sup>40</sup> 12 the ultimate conclusion is clear: ordinary commercial transaction, 13 without more, do not violate international law. In one case, the 14 defendant provided payments without asking for anything in return; in 15 the other case, the defendant engaged in commercial transactions 16 by lending money. One is guilty of violating international law, and 17 the other is not.

18 A similar distinction can be found by contrasting another pair of 19 Nuremberg-era precedents, the Zyklon B Case, in 1 Law Reports of Trials 20 of War Criminals 93 (1947), and The I.G. Farben Case, 8 T.W.C. 1081.
21 In the Zyklon B Case, defendant Bruno Tesch and a colleague were 22 engaged in the business of providing gasses and equipment for use in 23 exterminating lice. See 1 Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals at 24 94. Tesch and his colleague provided the German government with 25

26 <sup>40</sup> As noted in footnote 38 supra, the Second Circuit in Khulumani and 27 Presbyterian Church of Sudan has characterized these cases as 28 reflecting a "purpose" mens rea standard, whereas the District Court in In re South African Apartheid has characterized them as reflecting the "substantial effect" actus reus standard.

1 "expert technicians to carry out . . . gassing operations" as well as 2 training to the German government on using the gasses. Id. They did 3 not physically supply the gas itself, but were exclusive sales agents 4 for the gas in the relevant region of Germany. Id. The evidence 5 showed not only that Tesch provided the gas, the training, and the 6 tools for using the gas to carry out genocide; the evidence also showed 7 that Tesch had suggested to the German government that the Germans use 8 the gas in the first place. Id. at 95. Following the close of 9 evidence, the prosecutor argued that "[t]he essential question was 10 whether the accused knew of the purpose to which their gas was being 11 put," because "by supplying gas, knowing that it was to be used for 12 murder, the [ ] accused had made themselves accessories before the fact 13 to that murder." Id. at 100-01. Both Tesch and his colleague (who was 14 personally responsible for operating the business for approximately 200 15 days a year while Tesch was traveling) were convicted of being 16 accessories to murder. Id. at 102.

17 In contrast, in The I.G. Farben Case, various executives and 18 directors of I.G. Farben were charged with supplying Zyklon B gas to 19 the Germans for use in the concentration camps. 8 T.W.C. at 1168. The 20 defendants were directors of a company called "Degesch," which was 45% 21 owned by I.G. Farben and which was one of two companies that 22 manufactured and sold the Zyklon B gas. Id. at 1168-69. The tribunal 23 explained that the evidence showed that the directors were not closely 24 involved in the management of the company, and also that the German 25 government's use of the Zyklon B gas in the concentration camps was 26 kept top secret. Id. The court summarized the relevant 27 considerations:
28

1 The proof is quite convincing that large quantities of Cyclon-B 2 were supplied to the SS by Degesch and that it was used in the 3 mass extermination of inmates of concentration camps, including 4 Auschwitz. But neither the volume of production nor the fact that 5 large shipments were destined to concentration camps would alone 6 be sufficient to lead us to conclude that those who knew of such 7 facts must also have had knowledge of the criminal purposes to 8 which this substance was being put. Any such conclusion is refuted 9 by the well-known need for insecticides wherever large numbers of 10 displaced persons, brought in from widely scattered regions, are 11 confined in congested quarters lacking adequate sanitary 12 facilities.

13 Id. at 1169.

14 Accordingly, the I.G. Farben court held that the defendants, 15 unlike Bruno Tesch in the Zyklon B Case, were not guilty as accessories 16 to the gassing of the victims in the concentration camps. Id. In one 17 case, the defendants had provided the tools and the training on using 18 those tools for illegal purposes; in the other case, the defendants 19 provided only the tools and were unaware of the illegal acts being 20 done.

21 Having set forth these basic contours of aiding and abetting 22 liability, it is useful to turn to the cases that Plaintiffs argue are 23 most factually analogous, given that they involve businesspeople who 24 directly benefitted from the use of forced labor.

25 In The Flick Case, defendant Flick, in addition to being convicted 26 for contributing to Himmler and the SS, was also convicted of 27 "participation in the slave-labor program of the Third Reich" because 28 he acted with "knowledge and approval" of his co-defendant Weiss's decision to order additional freight-car production from a facility that utilized slave-labor. 6 T.W.C. at 1190, 1198. Plaintiffs argue that this conviction resulted from aiding and abetting or accessorial liability. However, Plaintiffs fail to note that Flick was the controlling owner of an industrial empire that included coal and iron

1 mining companies, steel-production companies, and finished-goods 2 companies that made machinery out of the raw steel produced by the 3 other companies. Id. at 1192. The indictment charged that Flick and 4 his co-defendants "sought and utilized . . . slave labor program [by 5 using] tens of thousands of slave laborers, including concentration 6 camp inmates and prisoners of war, in the industrial enterprises and 7 establishments owned, controlled, or influenced by them." Id. at 1194 8 (addition in original). The indictment further charged that Flick 9 "participated in the formulation and execution of such slave-labor 10 program." Id.

11 The tribunal held that Flick and the co-defendants were not guilty 12 of most of the charged offenses because "the slave-labor program had 13 its origin in Reich governmental circles and was a governmental 14 program, and . . . the defendants had no part in creating or launching 15 this program." Id. at 1196. The German government had required the 16 companies to employ "voluntary and involuntary foreign civilian 17 workers, prisoners of war and concentration camp inmates," and "the 18 defendants had no actual control of the administration of such 19 program." Id. The government allocated the involuntary labor and set 20 production quotas for the mines and factories. Id. at 1197.
21 Accordingly, the tribunal acquitted the defendants on the basis of 22 necessity and duress because they had acted under government 23 compulsion. Id. at 1201-02.

24 There was, however, a single exception to the acquittal: defendant 25 Weiss had actively solicited an "increased freight car production 26 quota" and "took an active and leading part in securing an allocation 27 of Russian prisoners of war for use in the work of manufacturing such 28

1 increased quotas." Id. at 1198. This decision was "initiated not in 2 governmental circles but in the plant management . . . for the purpose 3 of keeping the plant as near capacity production as possible." Id. at 4 1202. The necessary effect of the increased production quota was to 5 lead directly to "the procurement of a large number of Russian 6 prisoners of war" to carry out the production. Id. The tribunal 7 accordingly found Weiss guilty of participation in the unlawful 8 employment of slave labor.

9 The tribunal also found Flick guilty for the same acts because 10 "[t]he active steps taken by Weiss [were made] with the knowledge and 11 approval of Flick." Id. at 1202; see also id. at 1198 (noting "the 12 active participation of defendant Weiss, with the knowledge and 13 approval of defendant Flick, in the solicitation of increased freight 14 car production quota"). It must be emphasized that Flick was the 15 controlling owner of the entire industrial enterprise, and Weiss was 16 Flick's nephew and chief assistant. Id. at 1192-93. Given the close 17 relationship between Flick and the direct perpetrator Weiss, and given 18 Flick's central role in the industrial enterprise that directly 19 employed the slave labor, the case is better viewed as imposing direct 20 liability on Flick as a personal participant in the employment of slave 21 labor. See, e.g., In re Agent Orange Product Liability Litig., 373 F.
22 Supp. 2d 7, 98 (E.D.N.Y. 2005) ("Flick was found guilty of charges 23 reflecting his commercial activities and those of his corporations.").
24 Alternatively, Flick's liability could viewed as an example of the 25 operation of respondeat superior liability under agency principles, or 26 command responsibility, or, perhaps, aiding and abetting liability of 27 the type described in The Einsatzgruppen Case, where a top-level 28

1 commanding authority fails to prevent a known violation. See 2 Einsatzgruppen Case, 4 T.W.C. at 572; see also Delalic, 1998 WL
3 34310017, at ¶ 360 ("Noting th[e] absence of explicit reasoning [in 4 Flick], the United Nations War Crimes Commission has commented that it 5 'seems clear' that the tribunal's finding of guilt was based on an 6 application of the responsibility of a superior for the acts of his 7 inferiors which he has a duty to prevent.") (citing Trial of Friedrich 8 Flick et al., in 9 Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals 54 (1949));
9 accord Hilao v. Estate of Marcos, 103 F.3d 767, 777-78 (9th Cir. 1996) 10 (discussing principles of command responsibility).

11 The same conclusion may be drawn from the I.G. Farben Case's 12 discussion of slave labor (which is also relied upon by Plaintiffs).
13 The I.G. Farben company had undertaken a construction project in 14 Auschwitz to build a rubber factory. I.G. Farben Case, 8 T.W.C. 1081, 15 1180-84. Defendant Krauch was the Plenipotentiary General for Special 16 Questions of Chemical Production, and was responsible for "pass[ing] 17 upon the applications for workers made by the individual plants of the 18 chemical industry." Id. at 1187. The tribunal held that, although 19 Krauch was not responsible for certain wrongful acts in which he was 20 not personally involved,

21 he did, and we think knowingly, participate in the allocation of 22 forced labor to Auschwitz and other places where such labor was 23 utilized within the chemical field. . . . In view of what he 24 clearly must have known about the procurement of forced labor and the part he voluntarily played in its distribution and allocation, his activities were such that they impel us to hold that he was a willing participant in the crime of enslavement.

25 Id. at 1189. Plaintiffs argue that Krauch's case illustrates the scope 26 of aiding and abetting liability under international law, and that the 27 tribunal's discussion reflects a "knowledge" mens rea standard.
28

1 However, the tribunal's decision plainly rests on the fact that Krauch 2 "knowingly[] participate[d] in the allocation of forced labor to 3 Auschwitz," and "was a willing participant in the crime of 4 enslavement." Id. at 1189 (emphasis added). The case is plainly not 5 an example of aiding and abetting liability.

6 These same observations regarding direct personal involvement 7 apply equally to the third major Nuremberg-era case involving German 8 industrialists. In United States v. Krupp ("The Krupp Case"), the 9 tribunal convicted various directors and officers of the Krupp 10 corporation for using forced labor in their factories. The tribunal 11 cited evidence such as a letter from the Board of Directors to the 12 German Army High Command stating that "we are . . . very anxious to 13 employ Russian prisoners of war in the very near future, [and] we 14 should be grateful if you would give us your opinion on this matter as 15 soon as possible." Krupp, 9 T.W.C. at 1439. In this and other 16 instances, "the Krupp firm had manifested not only its willingness but 17 its ardent desire to employ forced labor." Id. at 1440. All but three 18 of the defendants had "participated in the establishment and 19 maintenance" of a particularly brutal forced labor camp at 20 Dechenschule. Id. at 1400-02. Of the three who were not involved with 21 Dechenschule, one (Pfirsch) was acquitted of forced labor charges 22 because he was not involved in any of the company's forced labor 23 activities. See generally id. at 1402-49 (court's factual summary and 24 legal analysis is silent as to Pfirsch). One of the other three 25 (Loeser) was found guilty because he had participated directly in the 26 creation of a forced-labor factory at Auschwitz. Id. at 1414, 1449.
27 The third (Korschan) was found guilty because he had directly 28

1 supervised a large contingent of Russian laborers and had signed a 2 letter proposing the use of concentration-camp labor to increase the 3 production of armaments toward the end of the war. Id. at 1405, 1418-
4 19, 1449. The court accordingly rejected the Krupp employees' 5 necessity defense and found all but one of them (Pfirsch) guilty of 6 employing forced labor in their business. Id. at 1441-49.

7 Thus, like the Krauch case, Krupp does not provide any discussion 8 of secondary liability for the underlying violations. Contrary to 9 Plaintiffs' characterization, the defendants in these two cases were 10 direct participants in the illegal acts, and these cases are inapposite 11 to the present case.

12 E. ILLUSTRATIONS UNDER THE ALIEN TORT STATUTE<sup>41</sup>

13 These foundational principles of aiding and abetting liability are 14 illustrated in the Second Circuit's recent decision in Presbyterian 15 Church of Sudan v. Talisman Energy, Inc., 582 F.3d 244 (2d Cir. 2009).
16 The Presbyterian Church of Sudan court held on summary judgment that a 17 Canadian energy firm had not purposefully aided and abetted the 18 Sudanese government in committing crimes against humanity. The court 19 examined the evidence and determined that there was no reasonable 20 inference that the defendants acted with the purpose of furthering the

23 <sup>41</sup> The Court notes that the present Order largely avoids discussing 24 international-law precedents from the International Criminal 25 Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda. The Court has 26 examined these cases and finds that they are factually inapposite 27 because they discuss aiding and abetting liability in the context of 28 civil war and military control of the population. None of the International Criminal Tribunal cases offer analogous discussions of aiding and abetting liability with respect to business transactions.

For a thorough discussion of the limitations of the International Criminal Tribunal cases, see Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 334-37 (Korman, J., concurring).

1 Sudanese government's policies of clearing out the disfavored ethnic 2 groups. Specifically, the defendants' actions included the following:
3 "(1) upgrading the Heglig and Unity airstrips; (2) designating areas 4 'south of the river' in Block 4 for oil exploration; (3) providing 5 financial assistance to the Government through the payment of 6 royalties; and (4) giving general logistical support to the Sudanese 7 military." Id. at 261 (quoting Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 453 F.
8 Supp. 2d at 671-72) (alterations omitted).

9 The first issue involved the assistance with building roads and 10 airstrips despite knowing that this infrastructure might be used by the 11 government to conduct attacks on civilians. The court recognized that 12 the defendants "had a legitimate need to rely on the [Sudanese] 13 military for defense" because of the unrest in the region; given this 14 legitimate need, the evidence that the defendant was "coordinating with 15 the military supports no inference of a purpose to aid atrocities."
16 Id. at 262. As for the second sets of acts - designating certain areas 17 for oil exploration - there was no evidence that the oil exploration 18 even occurred or that any international law violations took place. Id.
19 With respect to royalty payments to the government, the court explained 20 that "[t]he royalties paid by [defendant] may have assisted the 21 Government in its abuses, as it may have assisted any other activity 22 the Government wanted to pursue. But there is no evidence that 23 [defendants] acted with the purpose that the royalty payments be used 24 for human rights abuses." Id. Finally, the act of providing fuel to 25 the military was not criminal because "there is no showing that 26 Talisman was involved in such routine day-to-day [defendant] operations 27 as refueling aircraft. Second, there is no evidence that [defendant's] 28

1 workers provided fuel for the purpose of facilitating attacks on 2 civilians; to the contrary, an e-mail from a Talisman employee to his 3 supervisor, which plaintiffs use to show that the military refueled at 4 a [defendant] airstrip, expresses anger and frustration at the military 5 using the fuel." Id. at 262-63. In short, none of the purported acts 6 of aiding and abetting were supported by the necessary "purpose" mens 7 rea.

8 Notably, the court stated that something more than mere knowledge 9 and assistance are required to hold commercial actors liable for third 10 parties' violations of international law. The court explained:

11 There is evidence that southern Sudanese were subjected to attacks 12 by the Government, that those attacks facilitated the oil 13 enterprise, and that the Government's stream of oil revenue 14 enhanced the military capabilities used to persecute its enemies.
15 But if ATS liability could be established by knowledge of those 16 abuses coupled only with such commercial activities as resource development, the statute would act as a vehicle for private parties to impose embargos or international sanctions through civil actions in United States courts. Such measures are not the province of private parties but are, instead, properly reserved to governments and multinational organizations.

17 Id. at 264.

18 The Presbyterian Church of Sudan court's ultimate conclusion is in 19 full accord with the trend identified supra with respect to the 20 Nuremberg-era cases involving German industrialists. When a business 21 engages in a commercial quid pro quo - for example, by making a loan to 22 a third party - it is insufficient to show merely that the business 23 person knows that the transaction will somehow facilitate the third 24 party's wrongful acts. See The Ministries Case, 14 T.W.C. at 621-22.
25 Rather, the business person must participate more fully in the wrongful 26 acts - most obviously, in the cases involving the primary liability of 27 the industrialists who personally participated in planning and using of 28

1 slave labor. See, e.g., Krupp, 9 T.W.C. at 1439-49; The I.G. Farben 2 Case, 8 T.W.C. at 1189; The Flick Case, 6 T.W.C. at 1190-93. Or, 3 alternatively, the business person must be acting in a non-commercial, 4 non-mutually-beneficial manner, as with the banker in The Flick Case
5 who gratuitously funded the SS's criminal activities, 6 T.W.C. at 1219-6 20, or the chemical-company employees in the Zyklon B Case who provided 7 the gas, tools, and specific training that facilitated the Germans'

10 This conclusion is supported by the domestic caselaw applying the 11 Alien Tort Statute. In Corrie v. Caterpillar, Inc., 403 F. Supp. 2d 12 1019, (W.D. Wash. 2005), aff'd on other grounds, 503 F.3d 974, 977 (9th 13 Cir. 2007) (holding that case presented nonjusticiable political 14 question), the district court held that a bulldozer manufacturer could 15 not be held liable for aiding and abetting the Israeli military in 16 demolishing residences and causing deaths and injuries to the 17 residents. The court explained that even if the defendant "knew or 18 should have known" (as the plaintiff conclusorily alleged in the pre-19 Twombly era, see id. at 1023) that the bulldozers would be used to 20 commit those illegal acts, "[o]ne who merely sells goods to a buyer is 21 not an aider and abettor of crimes that the buyer might commit, even if 22 the seller knows that the buyer is likely to use the goods unlawfully, 23 because the seller does not share the specific intent to further the 24 buyer's venture." Id. at 1027 (citing United States v. Blankenship, 25 970 F.2d 283, 285-87 (7th Cir. 1992) ("a supplier joins a venture only 26 if his fortunes rise or fall with the venture's, so that he gains by 27 its success")).

1 A relevant contrast to Presbyterian Church of Sudan and Corrie may 2 be found in the allegations against automakers Daimler, Ford, and 3 General Motors in In re South African Apartheid Litig., 617 F. Supp. 2d 4 228 (S.D.N.Y. 2009), on remand from Khulumani, 504 F.3d 254. The 5 plaintiffs in that case alleged that the automakers "aided and abetted 6 extrajudicial killing through the production and sale of specialized 7 military equipment." Id. at 264; see also id. at 266-67. The 8 defendants were not selling ordinary vehicles to the South African 9 government; they were selling "heavy trucks, armored personnel 10 carriers, and other specialized vehicles," including "military 11 vehicles." Id. at 264, 266. "These vehicles were the means by which 12 security forces carried out attacks on protesting civilians and other 13 antiapartheid activists." Id. at 264. The plaintiffs also alleged 14 that the automakers both knew of and affirmatively expressed their 15 support for the South African government's illegal activities. Id.
16 Accordingly, the court held that the automakers could be held liable 17 for selling these military-type products to the South African 18 government, thereby aiding and abetting the government's atrocities.
19 On the other hand, the court held that the automakers could not be 20 liable for selling "passenger vehicles" and mass-market light trucks to 21 the government, because the "[t]he sale of cars and trucks without 22 military customization or similar features that link them to an illegal 23 use does not meet the actus reus requirement of aiding and abetting a 24 violation of the law of nations." Id. at 267.

25 The South African Apartheid plaintiffs introduced similar 26 allegations with respect to computer manufacturer IBM. The plaintiffs 27 alleged that IBM provided computers to the South African regime and 28

1 that the computers were used to further the regime's policies of 2 apartheid because the computers allowed the regime to create a registry 3 of individuals in order to relocate them and change their citizenship.
4 Id. at 265. Importantly, the plaintiffs alleged that "IBM employees 5 also assisted in developing computer software and computer support 6 specifically designed to produce identity documents and effectuate 7 denationalization." Id. at 265; see also id. at 268. These 8 "customized computerized systems were indispensable to the organization 9 and implementation of a system of geographic segregation and racial 10 discrimination in a nation of millions." Id. at 265.<sup>42</sup>

11 The distinction between Corrie and In re South African Apartheid 12 is instructive. In one case (Corrie), a manufacturer sold its ordinary 13 goods to a foreign government and the foreign government, with the 14

15 <sup>42</sup> The plaintiffs brought additional claims against the automakers and 16 also brought claims against an arms manufacturer whose weapons were used by the South African government.

17 The plaintiffs alleged that the automakers "provided information 18 about anti-apartheid activists to the South African Security Forces, 19 facilitated arrests, provided information to be used by 20 interrogators, and even participated in interrogations." In re South 21 African Apartheid, 617 F. Supp. 2d at 264. These allegations were 22 clearly analogous to defendant Ohlendorf's case in The Einsatzgruppen Case, 4 T.W.C. at 569, in which the tribunal found the "defendant guilty of aiding and abetting Nazi war crimes by turning over a list of individuals who he knew 'would be executed when found.'" In re South African Apartheid, 617 F. Supp. 2d at 264 n.192 (quoting The Einsatzgruppen Case, 4 T.W.C. at 569).

23 In obiter dicta, the district court addressed those allegations 24 against the arms manufacturer despite the fact that the arms
25 manufacturer had not brought a motion to dismiss. Id. at 269-70 &
26 n.231. The court suggested that the allegations sufficiently stated 27 aiding and abetting claims with respect to the arms manufacturer's 28 provision of equipment used to commit extrajudicial killings and enforcing apartheid. Id. at 270. The court suggested that the allegations were insufficient with respect to acts of torture, unlawful detention, and cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment, apparently because the complaint did not allege that the weapons were used to perpetrate those crimes. See id.

1 manufacturer's knowledge, used the goods to commit alleged atrocities.
2 In the other case (In re South African Apartheid), manufacturers sold 3 custom-made goods to a foreign government with the knowledge that those 4 goods were an essential element of the foreign government's wrongful 5 conduct. The manufacturers in South African Apartheid affirmatively 6 evidenced their support for the government's conduct, either implicitly 7 by intentionally creating custom equipment or explicitly by expressing 8 their support for the government. As reflected in this comparison, a 9 plaintiff must allege something more than ordinary commercial 10 transactions in order to state a claim for aiding and abetting human 11 rights violations. Indeed, consistent with the generally aiding and 12 abetting standard articulated supra, a plaintiff must allege that the 13 defendant's conduct had a substantial effect on the principal's 14 criminal acts. Mere assistance to the principal is insufficient.<sup>43</sup>

15 Another example can be found in Almog v. Arab Bank, PLC, 471 F.
16 Supp. 2d 257 (E.D.N.Y. 2007). There, the plaintiffs sued the defendant 17 bank for aiding and abetting various terrorist activities by Hamas and 18 other radical groups in violation of international law. The plaintiffs 19 alleged that the defendant bank knew of Hamas's terrorist activities, 20 knew that the bank accounts were being used to fund the terrorist 21 activities directly, and even "solicited and collected funds for" 22 organizations that were known to be fronts for Hamas. Id. at 290. The 23 plaintiffs also alleged that the bank was directly involved with

25 <sup>43</sup> The Court does not intend to suggest that the South African 26 Apartheid decision was correctly decided. It is unclear to this 27 Court whether (to take one example) an auto-manufacturer's act of 28 selling military vehicles constitutes aiding and abetting human rights violations under established and well-defined international law.

1 | Hamas's creation of bank accounts to provide for the families of 2 | suicide bombers. Id. at 291. The bank allegedly knew about the nature
3 | of the accounts, which "facilitated and provided an incentive for the 4 | suicide bombings and other murderous attacks," and the bank both
5 | maintained the accounts and "consulted with" a Hamas-related
6 | organization "to finalize the lists of beneficiaries" of the funds.
7 | Id. at 291-92. In light of these allegations, the court held that the 8 | defendant bank did not "merely provide[] routine banking services" that 9 | benefitted the terrorist organization. Id. at 291. Rather, the bank
10 | "active[ly] participat[ed]" in the terrorist organization's activities.
11 | Id. at 292; see also Lev v. Arab Bank, PLC, No. 08 CV 3251(NG)(VVP),
12 | 2010 WL 623636, at *2 (E.D.N.Y. Jan. 29, 2010) (holding that 13 | Presbyterian Church of Sudan's "purpose" mens rea standard was 14 | satisfied by the allegations in Almoq because "Plaintiffs' plausible
15 | factual allegations here permit the reasonable inference that Arab Bank
16 | was not merely the indifferent provider of 'routine banking services'
17 | to terrorist organizations, but instead purposefully aided their
18 | violations of international law").

19 | A useful factual contrast to the Almoq case can be found in part 20 | of the South African Apartheid case. In South African Apartheid, the 21 | plaintiffs alleged that a pair of banks had provided loans to the South
22 | African government and purchased "South African defense forces bonds."
23 | 617 F. Supp. 2d at 269. The court, relying heavily on the Nuremberg-
24 | era Ministries Case in which the tribunal acquitted the banker Karl 25 | Rasche, held that "supplying a violator of the law of nations with 26 | funds - even funds that could not have been obtained but for those 27 | loans - is not sufficiently connected to the primary violation to

1 fulfill the actus reus requirement of aiding and abetting a violation 2 of the law of nations." Id.

3 As a final pertinent example under the Alien Tort Statute, the 4 Ninth Circuit has analyzed a specific intent mens rea standard in 5 Abagninin v. AMVAC Chemical Corp., 545 F.3d 733 (9th Cir. 2008).<sup>44</sup> The 6 plaintiffs' allegations in Abagninin related to the defendants' alleged 7 genocide through their use of agricultural pesticides that caused male 8 sterility in villages in the Ivory Coast. Id. at 735-36. As defined 9 in international law, genocide requires a showing of "specific intent" 10 (which appears analogous to the "purpose" mens rea in the aiding and 11 abetting context) to achieve the particular wrongful result – namely, 12 to destroy a particular national or ethnic group as such. Id. at 739-13 40. The court specifically rejected a "knowledge" or general intent 14 standard, which would have required a showing of the defendant's 15 "awareness that a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of 16 events. Id. at 738. Instead, the court required plaintiff to allege 17 that defendants intended to cause the particular (genocidal) harm.
18 Even though plaintiff alleged that the defendant knew of the likelihood 19 that the chemicals caused this particular harm, the court found 20 significant the fact that the plaintiff "fail[ed] to allege that [the 21 defendant] intended to harm him through the use of chemicals." Id. at 22 740. The court refused to infer from the plaintiff's allegations of 23 knowledge, and rejected the plaintiff's conclusory statements that the

25 <sup>44</sup> The Abagninin case involved allegations that the defendant directly 26 participated in the crime of genocide. The case is relevant because 27 of the court's discussion of the specific intent standard under the 28 law of genocide, which is generally analogous to the "purpose" or "specific intent" mens rea standard under the law of aiding and abetting.

1 defendant "acted with intent." Id. Finally, although one of the 2 defendant's employees allegedly stated "[f]rom what I hear, they could 3 use a little birth control down there," the court refused to attribute 4 this statement to the corporate employer and also determined that the 5 statement was not directed at the Ivory Coast (as is required to show 6 genocidal intent with respect to Ivorians). Id.

8 VII. DISCUSSION REGARDING AIDING AND ABETTING ALLEGATIONS

9 A. BACKGROUND

10 Plaintiffs describe their allegations as encompassing three types 11 of activities: financial assistance; provision of farming supplies, 12 technical assistance, and training; and failure to exercise economic 13 leverage.

14 Defendants break down the alleged conduct into five groups:
15 financial assistance; providing farming supplies and technical farming 16 assistance; providing training in labor practices; failing to exercise 17 economic leverage; and lobbying the United States government to avoid a 18 mandatory labeling scheme.

19 Because Plaintiffs bear the burden of pleading sufficient "factual 20 content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the 21 defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged," the Court will adopt 22 Plaintiffs' preferred approach. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. ___, 23 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949 (2009). As will be shown, the First Amended 24 Complaint fails to allege that Defendants' conduct was "specifically 25 directed to assist [or] encourage . . . the perpetration of a certain 26 specific crime," and "ha[d] a substantial effect of the perpetration of 27 the crime." See Blagojevic (ICTY Appeals Chamber), at ¶ 127.

1 Additionally, the First Amended Complaint fails to allege that 2 Defendants acted with the "purpose" of facilitating the Ivorian farm 3 owners' wrongful acts. See Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 582 F.3d at 4 259.<sup>45</sup>

5 B. DISCUSSION OF ACTUS REUS

6 Plaintiffs assert that Defendants' conduct was "not only 7 substantial, it was essential" to the existence of child slavery in 8 Ivorian cocoa farming. (8/6/09 Opp. at 2.) Plaintiffs' fundamental 9 premise is that Defendants were not engaged in ordinary commercial 10 transactions; rather, Plaintiffs emphasize that Defendants "maintain[] 11 exclusive supplier/buyer relationships with local farms and/or farmer 12 cooperatives in Cote d'Ivoire," and that these exclusive relationships 13 allow Defendants "to dictate the terms by which such farms produce and 14 supply cocoa to them, including specifically the labor conditions under 15 which the beans are produced." (FAC ¶ 33.) Plaintiffs further contend 16 that "Defendants, because of their economic leverage in the region and 17 exclusive supplier/buyer agreements[,], each had the ability to control 18 and/or limit the use of forced child labor by the supplier farms and/or 19 farmer cooperatives from which they purchased their cocoa beans." (FAC 20 ¶ 48.)

21 In support of their claims, Plaintiffs detail three types of 22 conduct: financial assistance; provision of farming supplies, technical 23 assistance, and training; and failure to exercise economic leverage.
24 The Court addresses each form of assistance in turn.

25 ///

26
27 <sup>45</sup> And even if the Court were to apply the "knowledge" mens rea
28 standard, Plaintiffs' allegations fail to satisfy the applicable standard as set forth infra.

1                   1. FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

2           Plaintiffs allege that Defendants "provide ongoing financial 3 support, including advance payments and personal spending money to 4 maintain the farmers' and/or the cooperatives' loyalty as exclusive 5 suppliers." (FAC ¶ 34.) Plaintiffs argue that Defendants' financial 6 support "provide[d] the financial means . . . to commit international 7 human rights violations" and provided the "incentive for these farmers 8 to employ slave-labor." (8/6/09 Opp. at 14-15.)

9           As is repeatedly illustrated in the caselaw discussed supra, 10 merely "supplying a violator of the law of nations with funds" as part 11 of a commercial transaction, without more, cannot constitute aiding and 12 abetting a violation of international law. In re South African 13 Apartheid, 617 F. Supp. 2d at 269. The central example of this 14 principle is provided in the discussion of banker Karl Rasche in The 15 Ministries Case, 14 T.W.C. at 621-22. Rasche provided a loan of "very 16 large sums of money" to enterprises that used slave labor, but was 17 acquitted of aiding and abetting the enterprises' wrongdoing. Id. at 18 621. Likewise, the banks in South African Apartheid provided loans to 19 the South African government and purchased government bonds. 617 F.
20 Supp. 2d at 269. The act of providing financing, without more, does 21 not satisfy the actus reus requirement of aiding and abetting under 22 international law.

23           On the other hand, if defendant engages in additional assistance 24 beyond financing, or engages in financing that is gratuitous or 25 unrelated to any commercial purpose, the actus reus element has been 26 satisfied. So, for example, the bank in Almog v. Arab Bank did not 27 just hold and transfer funds on behalf of the terrorist organization 28

1 Hamas; rather, the bank took the extra step of "solicit[ing] and 2 collect[ing]" those funds for Hamas. Almoq, 471 F. Supp. 2d at 290.
3 As another example, the industrials Flick and Steinbrinck in The Flick 4 Case did not provide hundreds of thousands of Reichsmarks to Himmler
5 and the SS as part of a mutually beneficial commercial transaction; 6 rather, the funds were donated gratuitously, and served as "a blank 7 check" that ensured the "maintain[ence]" of the criminal organization.
8 The Flick Case, 6 T.W.C. at 1220-21.

9 These observations are summarized in the District Court opinion in 10 In re South African Apartheid:

11 It is (or should be) undisputed that simply doing business 12 with a state or individual who violates the law of nations is 13 insufficient to create liability under customary international 14 law. International law does not impose liability for declining to 15 boycott a pariah state or to shun a war criminal. . . .

16 Money [as in The Ministries Case] is a fungible resource, as 17 are building materials [which were also mentioned in The 18 Ministries Case]. However, poison gas [as in the Zyklon B Case] is 19 a killing agent, the means by which a violation of the law of 20 nations was committed. The provision of goods specifically 21 designed to kill, to inflict pain, or to cause other injuries 22 resulting from violations of customary international law bear a 23 closer causal connection to the principal crime than the sale of 24 raw materials or the provision of loans. Training in a precise 25 criminal use only further supports the importance of this link.
26 Therefore, in the context of commercial services, provision of the 27 means by which a violation of the law is carried out is sufficient 28 to meet the actus reus requirement of aiding and abetting liability under customary international law.

21 In re South African Apartheid, 617 F. Supp. 2d at 257-59 (citing The 22 Ministries Case, 14 T.W.C. at 621-22; The Zyklon B Case, in 1 Law 23 Reports of Trials of War Criminals, at 100-01). In contrast, 24 "supplying a violator of the law of nations with funds - even funds 25 that could not have been obtained but for those loans - is not 26 sufficiently connected to the primary violation to fulfill the actus 27 reus requirement of aiding and abetting a violation of the law of 28

1 nations." Id. at 269.

2 Here, it is clear from Plaintiffs' allegations that Defendants 3 were engaged in commercial transactions. Plaintiffs do not allege that 4 Defendants gratuitously gave large sums of money to the Ivorian farmers 5 in the manner that Flick and Steinbrinck gave money to the SS in The 6 Flick Case. Rather, Plaintiffs' allegations specifically state that 7 Defendants provided money to the farmers in order to obtain cocoa and 8 to ensure a future cocoa supply. (FAC ¶ 34.) Even if the payments are 9 described as "advance payments" (FAC ¶ 34), this is another way of 10 stating that Defendants were paying for cocoa. See Black's Law 11 Dictionary 1243 (9th ed. 2009) (defining "advance payment" as a 12 "payment made in anticipation of a contingent or fixed future liability 13 or obligation"). And to the extent that Plaintiffs allege that 14 Defendants provided "personal spending money" to the farmers, 15 Plaintiffs themselves assert that these payments were made "to maintain 16 the farmers' and/or the cooperatives' loyalty as exclusive suppliers."
17 (FAC ¶ 34.) Again, Plaintiffs' own Complaint identifies the commercial 18 quid pro quo in which Defendants were engaged.

19 In short, Plaintiffs fail to allege any facts showing that 20 Defendants' transfers of money were "specifically directed to assist 21 . . . a certain specific crime" and had a "substantial effect on the 22 perpetration of that crime." See Blagojevic (Appeals Chamber), at ¶ 23 127. Defendants' "financial assistance" does not constitute a 24 sufficient actus reus under international law.

25 2. PROVISION OF FARMING SUPPLIES, TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE, AND 26 TRAINING

27 Plaintiffs assert that Defendants provided "farming supplies, 28

1 including fertilizers, tools and equipment; training and capacity[-]
2 building in particular growing and fermentation techniques and general 3 farm maintenance, including appropriate labor practices, to grow the 4 quality and quantity of cocoa beans they desire." (FAC ¶ 34.) "The 5 training and quality control visits occur several times per year." 6 (Id.) Plaintiffs cite to Nestle's representation that it "provides 7 assistance in crop production," and "provide[s] technical assistance to 8 farmers." (FAC ¶¶ 36, 38.) This assistance "ranges from technical 9 assistance on income generation to new strategies to deal with crop 10 infestation." (FAC ¶ 38.) Similarly, Plaintiffs cite to Archer 11 Daniels Midland's representation that "ADM is working hard to help 12 provide certain farmer organizations with the knowledge, tools, and 13 support they need to grow quality cocoa responsibly and in a 14 sustainable manner." (FAC ¶ 40.) Archer Daniels Midland provides 15 "research into environmentally sound crop management practices, plant 16 breeding work to develop disease-resistant varieties and farmer field 17 schools to transfer the latest know-how into the hands of millions of 18 cocoa farmers around the world." (FAC ¶ 41.)

19 Plaintiffs argue that these allegations show that "Defendant were 20 providing the [Ivorian] farmers the necessary means by which to carry 21 out slave labor." (Pls. Opp. (8/6/09), at 17.) Plaintiffs describe 22 Defendants' actions as providing "logistical support and supplies 23 essential to continuing the forced labor and torture." (Id. at 18.)

24 This line of argument is unavailing. Plaintiffs contend that 25 Defendants' logistical support and other assistance generally furthered 26 the Ivorian farmers' ability to continue using forced labor. However, 27 Plaintiffs do not allege that Defendants provided supplies, assistance, 28

1 and training that was "specifically directed" to assist or encourage 2 "the perpetration of a certain specific crime," or that Defendants' 3 conduct had a "substantial effect" on the specific crimes of forced 4 labor, child labor, torture, and cruel, inhuman, and degrading
5 treatment. Plaintiffs simply do not allege that Defendants' conduct 6 was specifically related to those primary violations. Plaintiffs do 7 not allege, for example, that Defendants provided the guns and whips 8 that were used to threaten and intimidate the Plaintiffs, or that 9 Defendants provided the locks that were used to prevent Plaintiffs from 10 leaving their respective farms, or that Defendants provided training to 11 the Ivorian farmers about how to use guns and whips, or how to compress 12 a group of children into a small windowless room without beds, or how 13 to deprive children of food or water, or how to psychologically abuse 14 and threaten them.<sup>46</sup> That is the type of conduct that gives rise to 15 aiding and abetting liability under international law - conduct that 16 has a substantial effect on a particular criminal act. See, e.g., 17 Vasiljevic, 2004 WL 2781932, at ¶¶ 41, 133-34 (affirming defendant's 18 guilt for aiding and abetting murder where defendant, armed with a gun, 19 escorted victims to murder site and pointed his gun at victims to 20 prevent them from fleeing).

21 Plaintiffs' allegations do not identify any specific criminal acts 22 that were substantially furthered by Defendants' general farming 23 assistance. It is useful to compare Plaintiffs' allegations to the 24 relevant caselaw. The defendants in the Zyklon B Case provided the gas 25 that was used to commit murder and the training on how to use that gas;

---

27 <sup>46</sup>This list of illustrations is not meant to be exhaustive, nor is it 28 meant to suggest that Plaintiffs' Complaint would adequately state a claim for relief if it included such allegations.

1 the automakers in In re South African Apartheid provided the 2 specialized military vehicles that were used to further extrajudicial 3 killings, 617 F. Supp. 2d at 264, 266; and the computer company in that 4 case provided customized software and technical support designed to 5 facilitate a centralized identity database that supported the 6 government's segregation, denationalization, and racial discrimination 7 activities, id. at 265, 268. In contrast to those examples, the heavy-8 equipment manufacturer in Corrie sold its ordinary product to an 9 alleged human-rights abuser, 403 F. Supp. 2d at 1027, and the 10 automakers in South African Apartheid were not liable for their sales 11 of ordinary passenger vehicles to the apartheid regime, 617 F. Supp. 2d 12 at 267.

13 Another salient example is Prosecutor v. Delalic, in which the 14 ICTY acquitted the defendant on aiding and abetting charges based on 15 his "logistical support" to a prison that engaged in the unlawful 16 confinement of civilians. Delalic, No. IT-96-21-T, at ¶ 1144 (Trial 17 Chamber Nov. 16, 1998), available at 1998 WL 34310017, aff'd, No.
18 IT-96-21-A, at ¶ 360 (Appeals Chamber Fed. 20, 2001), available at 2001
19 WL 34712258. The trial court concluded that the defendant had no 20 authority over the prison camp, 1998 WL 34310017, at ¶ 669, and the 21 appeals court agreed that "he was not in a position to affect the 22 continued detention of the civilians at the [prison] camp."
23 Delalic, 2001 WL 34712258, at ¶ 355. The appeals court explained that 24 "the primary responsibility of Delalic in his position as co-ordinator 25 was to provide logistical support for the various formations of the 26 armed forces; that these consisted of, inter alia, supplies of 27 material, equipment, food, communications equipment, railroad access, 28

1 transportation of refugees and the linking up of electricity grids."
2 Id. at ¶ 355 (citing Trial Chamber Judgment, at ¶ 664). The courts
3 concluded that Delalic's involvement in the camp - although essential 4 to its functioning - was unrelated to the specific offense of unlawful 5 confinement of civilians. Delalic, 1998 WL 34310017, at ¶ 669; 2001 WL 6 34712258, at ¶ 355. Accordingly, he was acquitted of aiding and 7 abetting the crimes of unlawful confinement.<sup>47</sup>

8 Here, Plaintiffs allege that Defendants engaged in general 9 assistance to the Ivorian farmers' farming activities - mainly, 10 assisting crop production and providing training in labor practices.
11 Plaintiffs do not allege that Defendant provided any specific 12 assistance to the farmers' specific acts of slavery, forced labor, 13 torture, and the like. In light of the international caselaw described 14 supra, Plaintiffs' allegations do not give rise to a plausible 15

16
17 <sup>47</sup> Plaintiffs unpersuasively argue that Delalic occupied "a role 18 equivalent to the prison camp's electrician and maintenance 19 provider." (8/6/09 Opp. at 18.) This description of Delalic is 20 plainly contradicted by the facts of the case. The Trial Chamber 21 noted that some of "his duties were to operate as an effective 22 mediator between the War Presidency, which is a civilian body, and 23 the Joint Command of the Armed Forces. His regular intervention was 24 designed to facilitate the work of the War Presidency with the 25 different formations constituting the defence forces in Konjic. . . .
26 Mr. Delalic was accountable to, and would report orally or in writing 27 to, the body within the War Presidency which gave him the task." 28 Delalic, 1998 WL 34310017, at ¶ 662. Delalic also helped prepare for military operations by "provid[ing] supplies to [a military] unit, including communications equipment, quartermaster supplies, uniforms and cigarettes," and "ma[king] arrangements for the relevant needs for first aid equipment, transport conveyance and such supplies and facilities as could be provided by the civilian authorities." Id. at ¶¶ 666, 668.

It should go without saying that these are odd responsibilities to give to a mere "electrician and maintenance provider." The Court is unpersuaded by Plaintiffs' attempt to downplay Delalic's responsibilities.

1 inference that Defendants' conduct had a substantial effect on the 2 Ivorian farmers' specific human rights abuses. As Defendants rightly 3 point out, "providing a farmer with . . . fertilizer does not 4 substantially assist forced child labor on his farm." (Defs. Reply 5 (8/24/09, at 13.)<sup>48</sup> Plaintiffs' allegations establish, at most, that 6 Defendants generally assisted the Ivorian farmers in the act of growing 7 crops and managing their business - not that Defendants substantially 8 assisted the farmers in the acts of committing human rights abuses.

9 3. FAILURE TO EXERCISE ECONOMIC LEVERAGE

10 Plaintiffs' final set of allegations focus on Defendants' implicit 11 moral encouragement and failures to act to prevent the Ivorian farmers' 12 abuses. Plaintiffs assert that "Defendants, because of their economic 13 leverage in the region and exclusive supplier/buyer agreements each had 14 the ability to control and/or limit the use of forced child labor by 15 the supplier farms and/or farmer cooperatives from which they purchased 16 their cocoa beans." (FAC ¶ 48.) Plaintiffs argue that the 17 international law actus reus standard is satisfied if "a different 18 course of conduct could have been pursued that would have mitigated or 19 prevented the [primary] offense." (Pls. Opp. (8/6/09), at 20.)

20 a. LEGAL AUTHORITY

21 The precise nature of aiding and abetting liability for omissions, 22 moral support, and tacit approval and encouragement is uncertain. As 23 noted by the District Court in Presbyterian Church of Sudan v. Talisman 24 Energy, omissions, moral support, and tacit approval and encouragement

26 <sup>48</sup> Indeed, the most reasonable conclusion is that Defendants' conduct 27 reduced the extent of labor abuses on the Ivorian farms. Defendants' 28 training in crop production techniques would have increased the efficiency of the Ivorian cocoa farms, thereby reducing the need for forced labor and child labor.

1 fall outside the "core" definition of aiding and abetting liability 2 under international law. That court proceeded as this Court is 3 proceeding - it applied the "core" notion of aiding and abetting but 4 refrained from reaching into the outer fringes of international law to 5 identify a novel and debatable aiding and abetting standard. As the 6 court explained:

7       Talisman [the defendant] also attempts to demonstrate that 8 the actus reus standard for liability based on aiding and abetting 9 is a source of disagreement in international law. Talisman points 10 to a 1998 ICTY Trial Chamber decision that extended aiding and 11 abetting liability in "certain circumstances" to "moral support or 12 encouragement of the principals in their commission of the crime."
13 Prosecutor v. Furundzija, No. IT-95-17/1-T, 1998 WL 34310018, 14 para. 199 (Trial Chamber, Int'l Crim. Trib. for the Former 15 Yugoslavia, Dec. 10, 1998). Discussing this standard, a Ninth 16 Circuit panel decided to leave "the question whether such 17 liability should also be imposed for moral support which has the 18 required substantial effect to another day." Doe I [v. Unocal 19 Corp.], 395 F.3d [932,] 951 [(9th Cir. 2002), vacated on grant of 20 rehearing en banc, 395 F.3d 978, 979 (9th Cir. 2003)]. Talisman 21 draws liberally from a concurring opinion in Doe I which noted 22 that the inclusion of moral support is "far too uncertain and 23 inchoate a rule for us to adopt without further elaboration as to 24 its scope by international jurists," id. at 969-70 [Reinhardt, J., 25 concurring], and that "it is a novel standard that has been 26 applied by just two ad hoc international tribunals." Id. at 969.

27       The question of whether the "novel" moral support standard 28 should be included in the definition of aider and abettor liability, however, did not prevent the Ninth Circuit from imposing liability for aiding and abetting another's violation of international law under a settled, core notion of aider and abettor liability in international law "for knowing practical assistance or encouragement which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime." Id. at 951 [maj. op.]. Therein lies the flaw in Talisman's argument. The ubiquity of disagreement among courts and commentators regarding the fringes of customary international legal norms is unsurprising. The existence of such peripheral disagreement does not, however, impugn the core principles that form the foundation of customary international legal norms - principles about which there is no disagreement.

Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 374 F. Supp. 2d 331, 340-41 (S.D.N.Y.
2005) (order denying defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings).

The international tribunals themselves have recognized the uncertainty in this area of law. As explained by the prominent ICTY

1 decision in Prosecutor v. Tadic:

2 "mere presence [at the crime scene] seems not enough to constitute 3 criminally culpable conduct, "[b]ut what further conduct would 4 constitute aiding and abetting the commission of war crimes or some accessory responsibility is not known with sufficient exactitude for 'line-drawing' purposes."

5 Tadic, No. IT-94-1-T, at ¶ (Trial Judgment May 7, 1997) (internal 6 footnote omitted) (quoting Jordan Paust, My Lai and Vietnam, 57 Mil. L.
7 Rev. 99, 168 (1972)), available at 1997 WL 33774656. The tribunal then 8 summarized Nuremberg-era cases and emphasized that the cases "fail[ed] 9 to establish specific criteria" governing this form of liability. Id.

10 The state of the law has not cleared up in the years following 11 that decision. The International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia 12 and Rwanda have engaged in a great deal of discussion of omissions, 13 moral support, and tacit approval and encouragement, but have reached 14 only a few concrete conclusions. The law in this area is simply too 15 unclear to satisfy Sosa's requirements of definiteness and 16 universality. The Court therefore refrains from applying this 17 "uncertain and inchoate" rule. See Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 374 18 F. Supp. 2d at 340-41 (quotations omitted). In support of this 19 conclusion, the Court notes four additional observations regarding this 20 body of law.

21 First, one must attempt to distinguish omissions, moral support, 22 and tacit approval and encouragement from the concept of "command 23 responsibility," which "holds a superior responsible for the actions of 24 subordinates." Hilao v. Estate of Marcos, 103 F.3d 767, 777 (9th Cir.
25 1996). Under command responsibility, "a higher official need not have 26 personally performed or ordered the abuses in order to be held liable.
27 Under international law, responsibility for [jus cogens violations]

1 extends beyond the person or persons who actually committed those acts 2 - anyone with higher authority who authorized, tolerated or knowingly 3 ignored those acts is liable for them." Id. (quoting S. Rep. No. 249, 4 102d Cong., 1st Sess. at 9 (1991)).

5 For example, in a case relied upon by Plaintiffs, United States v.
6 Ohlendorf ("The Einsatzgruppen Case"), the defendant Fendler, the 7 second in command in his unit, was convicted of aiding and abetting war 8 crimes and crimes against humanity because he was aware of the large 9 number of executions and murders being committed by the subordinates in 10 his unit. Despite his knowledge of his subordinates' wrongful acts, 11 "there [wa]s no evidence that he ever did anything about it."
12 Einsatzgruppen Case, 4 T.W.C. at 572. The court emphasized that "[a]s 13 the second highest ranking officer in the Kommando [unit], his views 14 could have been heard in complaint or protest against what he now says 15 was a too summary [execution] procedure, but he chose to let the 16 injustice go uncorrected." Id. Had Fendler not been in such a high-17 level "position of authority," see Oric, 2008 WL 6930198, at ¶ 42, his 18 inaction would not have been sufficient to establish his guilt.

19 Second, an "omission" or "failure to act" only gives rise to 20 aiding and abetting liability if "there is a legal duty to act."
21 Prosecutor v. Mrksic, No. IT-95-13/1-A, at ¶ 134 & n.481 (ICTY Appeals 22 Chamber, May 5, 2009) (collecting cases) (quoting Oric, at ¶ 43)
23 (emphasis added), available at [http://www.icty.org/x/cases/mrksic/
24 acjug/en/090505.pdf](http://www.icty.org/x/cases/mrksic/acjug/en/090505.pdf). The most obvious "duty to act" is the commander's 25 "affirmative duty to take such measures as were within his power and 26 appropriate in the circumstances to protect prisoners of war and [] 27 civilian population[s]." In re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1, 16 (1946). In 28

1 this regard, "command responsibility" can be viewed as a form of aiding 2 and abetting liability in which a commander fails to satisfy his legal 3 duty of exercising his power to control his subordinates. See generally 4 Prosecutor v. Aleksovski, No. IT-95-14/1-T, at ¶ 72 (ICTY Trial 5 Chamber, June 25, 1999) ("Superior responsibility derives directly from 6 the failure of the person against whom the complaint is directed to 7 honour an obligation."), available at 1999 WL 33918298, aff'd in 8 relevant part and rev'd in part, No. IT-95-14/1-A, at ¶ 76 (ICTY 9 Appeals Chamber, Mar. 24, 2000) ("command responsibility . . . becomes 10 applicable only where a superior with the required mental element 11 failed to exercise his powers to prevent subordinates from committing 12 offences or to punish them afterwards."), available at 2000 WL
13 34467821; see also Prosecutor v. Kayishema, ICTR-95-1-T, at ¶ 202 14 (Trial Chamber May , 1999) (comparing aiding and abetting through tacit 15 approval and encouragement with command responsibility), available at 16 1999 WL 33288417, aff'd, No. ICTR-95-1-A (ICTR Appeals Chamber July 2, 17 2001), available at http://www.unictr.org/Portals/0/Case/English/
18 Kayishema\_F/decisions/index.pdf.<sup>49</sup>

19 In cases involving "omissions" by actors other than commanders, 20 "the question remains open as to whether the duty to act must be based 21 on criminal law, or may be based on a general duty" under other bodies 22 of law. Mrksic, at ¶ 149 (quoting prosecutor's brief); see also id. at 23 ¶ 151 (refraining from answering question posed in prosecutor's brief);

25 <sup>49</sup>The central readily identifiable distinction between command 26 responsibility and aiding and abetting liability is that command 27 responsibility requires a finding of formal or actual control; that 28 is, an agency (or similar) relationship between the primary wrongdoer and the defendant. See generally Blagojevic (Appeals Chamber), at ¶¶ 300-03; see also Doe v. Qi, 349 F. Supp. 2d 1259, 1329-33 (N.D. Cal.
2004) (summarizing doctrinal elements of command responsibility).

1 see also Oric, 2008 WL 6930198, at ¶ 43 (“The Appeals Chamber has never 2 set out the requirements for a conviction for omission in detail.”).
3 The only courts to reach definitive conclusions on this question have 4 held that the duty to act may arise under either criminal law or the 5 “laws and customs of war.” See Mrksic, at ¶ 151 & n.537 (citing 6 Blaskic appeal judgment, at ¶ 663 n.1384). However, there are no cases 7 holding that omissions of other duties (such as non-criminal duties 8 existing under statute or common law) will give rise to aiding and 9 abetting liability. In light of this uncertainty, the Court will 10 assume that the requisite “universal consensus of civilized nations” 11 for purposes of the Alien Tort Statute only recognizes liability in 12 cases where the duty to act arises from an obligation imposed by 13 criminal laws or the laws and customs of war. See Presbyterian Church 14 of Sudan, 582 F.3d at 259 (adopting approach of looking to common core 15 definition to determine appropriate choice among competing
16 articulations of a standard); Abagninin, 545 F.3d at 738-40 (same).

17 Third, it must be emphasized that aiding and abetting by way of 18 “moral support” and “tacit approval and encouragement” is a rare breed 19 (and, in fact, a non-existent breed for purposes of the Alien Tort 20 Statute). To the extent this type of liability even exists, all of the 21 international tribunal cases reviewed by the Court involve defendants 22 who held a position of formal authority. In many ways, the discussions 23 in these cases tend to overlap with discussions of command 24 responsibility and/or joint criminal enterprise. See generally 25 Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 334-37 (Korman, J., concurring) (discussing 26 inadequacies of International Tribunal decisions). To the extent that 27 these cases purport to identify an independent international law norm 28

1 regarding "moral support" and "tacit approval and encouragement," there 2 simply is not a sufficiently well-defined, universally recognized norm 3 to satisfy Sosa's requirements.

4 As an initial matter, it is important to note that all of the 5 "moral support" cases involve a defendant who held formal military, 6 political, or administrative authority. As summarized by the recent 7 Appeals Chamber decision in Oric, in the cases that have "applied the 8 theory of aiding and abetting by tacit approval and encouragement, 9 . . . the combination of a position of authority and physical presence 10 at the crime scene allowed the inference that non-interference by the 11 accused actually amounted to tacit approval and encouragement." Oric, 12 2008 WL 6930198, at ¶ 42 & n.97 (citing Brdjanin, ¶ 273 nn. 553, 555).
13 It is important to remember that "authority" requires a high degree of 14 control, either de jure or de facto, over the perpetrators. See 15 generally Kayishema, 1999 WL 33288417, at ¶¶ 479-507 (discussing 16 concepts of de jure and de facto control in context of command 17 responsibility); see also Black's Law Dictionary 152 (9th ed. 2009) 18 (defining "authority," in pertinent part, as "[g]overnment power or 19 jurisdiction").<sup>50</sup> In this vein, all of the cases cited by the recent 20 Appeals Chamber decisions in Oric and Brdjanin support the conclusion 21 that only a formal authority figure's presence and inaction may

24 <sup>50</sup> It is appropriate to cite Black's Law Dictionary when interpreting 25 the decisions of the international tribunals. See, e.g., Prosecutor 26 v. Naletilic, No. IT-98-34-A, at ¶ 24 & nn. 1400-01 (ICTY Appeals 27 Chamber May 3, 2006) (citing Black's to define crime of 28 "deportation"); ¶¶ 674-75 & nn. 1332-34 (ICTY Trial Chamber July 31, 2003) (same); Prosecutor v. Semanza, No. ICTR-97-20-T, at ¶¶ 380, 384 & nn. 629, 637-38 (ICTR Trial Chamber May 15, 2003) (citing, inter alia, Black's for definitions of "plan" and "aid and abet"), available at 2003 WL 23305800.

1 constitute tacit approval and encouragement. See Aleksovski, 2000 WL
2 34467821, at ¶¶ 76, 170-72 (defendant was prison warden); Kayishema, 3 1999 WL 33288417, at ¶¶ 479-81 (defendant was prefect - i.e., top 4 regional executive); Prosecutor v. Akayesu, No. ICTR-96-4-T, at ¶ 77 5 (ICTR Trial Chamber Sept. 2, 1998), (defendant was bourgmestre - i.e., 6 town mayor with control over police), available at 1998 WL 1782077, 7 aff'd, No. ICTR-96-4 (ICTR Appeals Chamber June 1, 2001), available at 8 2001 WL 34377585; Furundzija, 38 I.L.M. 317, at ¶¶ 122, 130 (defendant 9 was police commander); see also Tadic, 1997 WL 33774656, at ¶ 686 10 (discussing Nuremberg-era case in which the mayor and members of German 11 guard failed to intervene when civilians beat and killed American 12 pilots parading in Germany) (citing United States v. Kurt Goebell 13 ("Borkum Island case"), in Report, Survey of the Trials of War Crimes 14 Held at Dachau, Germany, Case. no. 12-489, at 2-3 (Sept. 15, 1948)).
15 In other words, "tacit approval or encouragement" requires that the 16 defendant must hold a position of formal or de facto military, 17 political, or administrative authority. The rationale for this rule is 18 that "it can hardly be doubted that the presence of an individual with 19 authority will frequently be perceived by the perpetrators of the 20 criminal act as a sign of encouragement likely to have a significant or 21 even decisive effect on promoting its commission." Aleksovski, 1999 WL 22 33918298, at ¶ 65.

23 Plaintiffs rely heavily on a Nuremberg-era case that lies at the 24 outer fringe of this line of cases, The Synagogue Case. As an initial 25 matter, the Court notes that The Synagogue Case is not an appropriate 26 authority for purposes of the Alien Tort Statute. The Court agrees 27 with Defendants that The Synagogue Case "does not reflect customary 28

1 international law." (8/24/09 Reply at 15 n.9.) The ICTY in Furundzija 2 explained that The Synagogue Case was decided "under the provision on 3 co-perpetration of a crime ('Mittäterschaft') of the then German penal 4 code (Art. 47 Strafgesetzbuch)." Furundzija, 38 I.L.M. 317, at ¶ 206.
5 In other words, The Synagogue Case reflects German domestic law and is 6 therefore an inappropriate source of authority for purposes of the 7 Alien Tort Statute under Sosa.

8         However, even if the Court were to consider The Synagogue Case as 9 a valid international law authority, the case stands for the general 10 proposition that defendants are only responsible for "moral support" if 11 they occupy a position of formal military, political, or administrative 12 authority vis-a-vis the perpetrators. Specifically, in The Synagogue 13 Case, the defendant was found guilty of aiding and abetting the 14 destruction of a Jewish synagogue. Although "he had not physically 15 taken part in" the acts of destruction, "[h]is intermittent presence on 16 the crime-scene, combined with his status as an 'alter Kämpfer,'" was a 17 sufficient actus reus to establish his guilt. Furundzija, 38 I.L.M.
18 317, at ¶ 205. Notably, an "'alter Kämpfer'" is a "long-time militant 19 of the Nazi party," a fact that places this case in line with the cases 20 from the ICTY and ICTR. See id. Secondary authorities reveal that 21 "alter Kämpfer" were not mere party members; rather, they were the core 22 members of the Nazi security and intelligence apparatus.<sup>51</sup> As explained 23 by an expert on German history, the alter Kämpfer were "men who without 24

25 <sup>51</sup>The Court notes that The Synagogue Case does not appear to be widely 26 available in English translation, and courts have been forced to rely 27 on the second-hand discussion contained in Furundzija. Because of 28 the unavailability of the original text of The Synagogue Case, the Court has resorted to secondary authorities to uncover the factual context of the decision.

1 exception had willingly joined the SS and who most clearly personified 2 its philosophy." David Clay Large, Reckoning without the Past: The 3 HIAG of the Waffen-SS and the Politics of Rehabilitation in the Bonn
4 Republic, 1950-1961, 59 Journal of Modern History 79, 90 (1987). It 5 should be recalled that "[t]he SS was the elite guard of the Nazi 6 party" and was responsible for policing, intelligence, and security 7 operations in Nazi Germany. United States v. Geiser, 527 F.3d 288, 290
8 (3d Cir. 2008); see also United States v. Negele, 222 F.3d 443, 445 9 (8th Cir. 2000) ("The SS, an organ of the Nazi party, acted as the 10 federal police force in Germany."); United States v. Kwoczak, 210 F.
11 Supp. 2d 638, 641 (E.D. Pa. 2002) (describing testimony of history 12 expert, who described the SS as "Hitler['s] own elite guard," which he 13 used "to consolidate police power in Germany" in the 1930s and which 14 "controlled networks of concentration camps"); United States v. Hajda, 15 963 F. Supp. 1452, 1462 (N.D. Ill. 1997) ("The SS was the elite guard 16 and intelligence unit of the Nazi Party of Germany."); see generally 17 The Nuremberg Trial, 6 F.R.D. 69, 140-43 (1946) (summarizing the 18 history of the SS and its criminal activities). The alter Kämpfer 19 therefore were not civilians - they were members of the state security 20 and police forces (the SS) and were, in fact, the most prominent 21 members of those organizations. In other words - and this is a point 22 that Plaintiffs have apparently overlooked (see 8/6/09 Opp. at 19) - 23 the defendant in The Synagogue Case possessed formal political and 24 administrative authority. Indeed, the Furundzija court emphasized that 25 the defendant's status as an authority figure was a necessary element 26 of his guilt. Furundzija, 38 I.L.M. 317 at ¶ 209 ("The supporter must 27 be of a certain status for [moral support] to be sufficient for 28

1 criminal responsibility."). Plaintiffs' own expert declaration
2 concurs. (See Collingsworth Decl. (2/23/09), Ex. A, Brief Amicus
3 Curiae of International Law Scholars Philip Alston, et al., Khulumani
4 v. Barclay National Bank, Nos. 05-2141, 05-2326 (2d Cir.) ("'[S]ilent 5 approval' or mere presence is not a convictable offense, at least among 6 civilians, though a spectator may aid and abet illegal conduct if he 7 occupies some position of authority.")) In short, a defendant is only 8 guilty of "tacit approval and encouragement" if the defendant occupies 9 a position of formal authority.

10 As a fourth and final observation about "moral support" and "tacit 11 approval and encouragement," it is important to distinguish aiding and 12 abetting through omissions, moral support, and tacit approval and 13 encouragement from other forms of secondary liability such as joint 14 criminal enterprises and conspiracies. As discussed supra, the 15 relevant distinctions are that:

16 (i) The aider and abettor carries out acts specifically 17 directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the 18 perpetration of a certain specific crime (murder, extermination, 19 rape, torture, wanton destruction of civilian property, etc.), and 20 this support has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the 21 crime. By contrast, it is sufficient for a participant in a joint 22 criminal enterprise to perform acts that in some way are directed 23 to the furtherance of the common design.

24 (ii) In the case of aiding and abetting, the requisite mental 25 element is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and 26 abettor assist the commission of the specific crime of the 27 principal. By contrast, in the case of participation in a joint 28 criminal enterprise, i.e. as a co-perpetrator, the requisite mens
rea is intent to pursue a common purpose.

Vasiljevic, 2004 WL 2781932, at ¶ 102.

To summarize, to the extent that "moral support" and "tacit approval and encouragement" are even actionable under the Alien Tort Statute (and the Court concludes that they are not adequately well-defined and widely adopted to satisfy Sosa), there are four important

1 points to keep in mind. First, some cases, such as the Einsatzgruppen 2 Case relied upon by Plaintiffs, tend to blur the distinction between 3 "command responsibility" and aiding and abetting. Second, a person is 4 liable for an "omission" or "failure to act" only if that person owes 5 an affirmative duty under criminal law or the laws and customs of war.
6 Third, the concept of "moral support" has only been applied in cases 7 involving persons possessing administrative, political, or military 8 authority and who are personally present at the crime scene while the 9 overt criminal acts are taking place. Fourth, and finally, it is 10 important to distinguish between the aiding and abetting actus reus and 11 the conspiracy/joint-criminal-enterprise actus reus. Unlike conspiracy 12 cases, aiding and abetting requires that the assistance must bear a 13 direct causative relationship to the underlying crime.

14 This discussion of "moral support" and "tacit encouragement and 15 approval" ought to demonstrate that this area of law lacks the 16 "specificity" and "definite content and acceptance among civilized 17 nations" to support a cause of action under Sosa, 542 U.S. at 732, 738.
18 The Court therefore agrees with the Southern District of New York's 19 observations quoted supra: "the inclusion of moral support is far too 20 uncertain and inchoate a rule for us to adopt without further 21 elaboration as to its scope by international jurists, and . . . it is a 22 novel standard that has been applied by just two ad hoc international 23 tribunals. The question of whether the 'novel' moral support standard 24 should be included in the definition of aider and abettor liability 25 . . . does not, however, impugn the core principles that form the 26 foundation of customary international legal norms - principles about 27 which there is no disagreement." Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 374 F.
28

1 Supp. 2d at 340-41 (internal citations and quotations omitted).

2 It is telling that no Alien Tort Statute case has permitted a 3 plaintiff to proceed on the theory of aiding and abetting through 4 "moral support" or "tacit encouragement and approval." Those words are 5 often quoted as part of the general aiding and abetting legal standard, 6 but there are simply no holdings that apply that portion of the 7 standard. See, e.g., In re South African Apartheid, 617 F. Supp. 2d at 8 257 (quoting standard without applying it); Almog, 471 F. Supp. 2d at 9 286-87 (same); Presbyterian Church of Sudan v. Talisman Energy, 453 F.
10 Supp. 2d 633, 666-67 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (order granting summary judgment)
11 (same); Bowoto, 2006 WL 2455752, at *4 (same); In re Agent Orange, 373
12 F. Supp. 2d at 54 (same); Presbyterian Church of Sudan v. Talisman 13 Energy, 244 F. Supp. 2d 289, 324-25 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (order denying 14 motion to dismiss) (same). The Presbyterian Church of Sudan came the 15 closest to reaching such a holding, as it concluded on a motion to 16 dismiss that the defendants had "encouraged Sudan" to "carry out acts 17 of 'ethnic cleaning.'" Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 244 F. Supp. 2d 18 at 324. However, that case does not support the proposition that 19 "moral support" or "tacit encouragement and approval" are actionable 20 under the Alien Tort Statute. The allegations in the Presbyterian 21 Church of Sudan complaint showed that the defendants were not mere 22 bystanders - in addition to "encourag[ing]" Sudan's actions, the 23 defendants had also "worked with Sudan" and "provided material support 24 to Sudan" in committing genocide. Id. at 324. Specifically, the 25 complaint alleged that the defendants had worked in concert with 26 Sudanese government to engage in ethnic cleansing, held "regular 27 meetings" with Sudanese government, developed a "joint . . . strategy 28

1 . . . to execute, enslave or displace" civilians, and issued 2 "directives" and "request[s]" to the Sudanese government. Id. at 300-3 01. Such conduct constitutes overt acts of assistance, not moral 4 support or tacit encouragement.

5 The Court accordingly concludes that the actus reus of "moral 6 support" and "tacit encouragement and approval" is not sufficiently 7 well-defined and universally accepted to constitute an actionable 8 international law norm under Sosa.

9 b. FURTHER DISCUSSION

10 If, however, "moral support" and "tacit encouragement and 11 approval" were actionable under the Alien Tort Statute (and the Court 12 firmly disagrees with such a proposition), Plaintiffs' allegations 13 would fail to meet the standard articulated in the international 14 caselaw discussed supra. There is absolutely no legal authority - let 15 alone well-defined and universally accepted legal authority - to 16 support the proposition that an economic actor's long-term exclusive 17 business relationship constitutes aiding and abetting, either as tacit 18 "moral support" or as overt acts of assistance. Although Plaintiffs 19 argue that Defendants are liable on account of their "failure to 20 exercise economic leverage" (8/6/09 Opp. at 19-21), there is absolutely 21 no international law authority to support such a legal standard - let 22 alone the type of authority that is well-defined and universally 23 agreed-upon to satisfy Sosa. The Court refrains from extending the 24 existing caselaw (much of which consists of dicta rather than holdings) 25 to recognize such an unprecedented form of liability.

26 Plaintiffs have not, therefore, alleged a sufficient actus reus in 27 the form of tacit encouragement or moral support on account of 28

1 Defendants' failure to exercise their economic leverage over Ivorian 2 farmers who committed human rights abuses.

3 4. SUMMARY OF ACTUS REUS

4 Plaintiffs insist that it is inappropriate to undertake a "divide-5 and-conquer" analysis of the Complaint. They assert that Defendants' 6 conduct must be viewed as a whole, and that even if each individual 7 element of Defendants' conduct does not rise to the level of an 8 actionable international law violation, Defendants' conduct as a whole 9 does reach that level. However, even viewing Plaintiffs' allegations 10 collectively rather than separately, the overwhelming conclusion is 11 that Defendants were purchasing cocoa and assisting the production of 12 cocoa. It is clear from the caselaw that ordinary commercial 13 transactions do not lead to aiding and abetting liability. Even if 14 Defendants were not merely engaged in commercial conduct, something 15 more is required in order to find a violation of international law - 16 the defendants' conduct must have a substantial effect on the 17 perpetration of the specific crime. Plaintiffs in this case have not 18 identified any of Defendants' conduct, taken separately or 19 holistically, that had a material and direct effect on the Ivorian 20 farmers' specific wrongful acts. In short, Plaintiffs "have not nudged 21 their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible." Twombly, 22 550 U.S. at 570. The actus reus allegations are insufficient as a 23 matter of law.

24 C. DISCUSSION OF MENS REA

25 In addition to the actus reus element of aiding and abetting, 26 Defendants also challenge the adequacy of Plaintiffs' allegations 27 regarding the mens rea standard.
28

1 Plaintiffs' Complaint adequately alleges that Defendants knew or 2 should have known of the labor violations on the Ivorian farms.
3 Defendants engaged in a long-term relationship with these farmers and 4 had occasional ground-level contact with the farms. (FAC ¶ 34.)
5 Defendants undertook a number of activities that reflected an awareness 6 of the labor problems. Defendants represented to the public that 7 Defendants were concerned about the farmers' labor practices and that 8 Defendants were taking affirmative steps to reduce the amount of child 9 labor/forced labor used on Ivorian farms. (FAC ¶¶ 38, 49-51.)
10 Defendants even took efforts to prevent Congress from enacting a 11 stringent importation regime that would have required imported 12 chocolate to be certified as "slave free." (FAC ¶¶ 54-55.) In light 13 of these allegations, as well as allegations about the existence of 14 various reports from public organizations documenting labor abuses in 15 Cote d'Ivoire (FAC ¶¶ 45-46, 51), Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged 16 that Defendants knew or reasonably should have known about the child-17 labor abuses on the Ivorian farms.

18 However, these allegations are insufficient to establish that 19 Defendants acted with the mens rea required by international law.

20 Applying the "purpose" standard adopted in Presbyterian Church of 21 Sudan, 582 F.3d at 259 - which is, as noted, supported by the Rome 22 Statute, art. 25(3)(c), the Hechingen Case, in 7 J. Int'l Crim. Just.
23 at 150, and the International Court of Justice's recent agnosticism in 24 Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Serbia and Montenegro, 2007 I.C.J. No. 91, at 25 ¶ 421 - Plaintiffs' allegations are inadequate to establish the 26 requisite mens rea. Plaintiffs do not - and, as they conceded at oral 27 argument on November 10, 2009, cannot - allege that Defendants acted 28

1 with the purpose and intent that their conduct would perpetuate child 2 slavery on Ivorian farms.<sup>52</sup>

3 The Ninth Circuit's analysis of the genocide allegations in 4 Abagninin, 545 F.3d at 740, provides a relevant analogy regarding 5 pleading standards. The plaintiff in Abagninin had alleged that the 6 defendant knew that its chemicals could cause reproductive harms; 7 however, the Ninth Circuit held that the plaintiff "fail[ed] to allege 8 that [the defendant] intended to harm him through the use of [those] 9 chemicals." Id. (emphasis added). Where a specific intent mens rea is 10 required (as in Abagninin), it is insufficient to allege the 11 defendant's knowledge of likely consequences. Purpose or specific 12 intent must be shown, and Plaintiffs' allegations fail to meet this 13 standard. Plaintiffs' allegations do not support the conclusion that 14 Defendants intended and desired to substantially assist the Ivorian 15 farmers' acts of violence, intimidation, and deprivation.

16 Even if the Court were to apply the "knowledge" mens rea standard 17 articulated in certain international caselaw (an approach which the 18 Court has rejected, see supra), Plaintiffs' allegations would fail to 19 move "across the line from conceivable to plausible." Twombly, 550 20 U.S. at 570. As noted supra, the leading international law "knowledge" 21 standard requires that the defendant "know[s] that the acts performed 22 assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal 23 perpetrator." Blagojevic, at ¶ 127 (emphasis added).

24 Plaintiffs' allegations fail to raise a plausible inference that 25

26 <sup>52</sup> Specifically, Plaintiffs' counsel stated: "Now, if what was 27 required was a state of mind that the defendants wanted child slave 28 labor to go on, you know, positively desired it, which is what I think you're saying . . . [t]hen we would not be able to allege that."

1 Defendants knew or should have known that the general provision of 2 money, training, tools, and tacit encouragement (assuming, that is, 3 that such acts even satisfied the actus reus standard discussed supra)
4 helped to further the specific wrongful acts committed by the Ivorian 5 farmers. Again, it must be recalled that the specific alleged wrongs 6 include the Ivorian farmers' acts of whipping, beating, threatening, 7 confining, and depriving Plaintiffs. (See FAC ¶¶ 57-59.) There are no 8 allegations that Defendants knew that their conduct substantially 9 assisted those wrongful acts. Instead, the allegations, and the 10 plausible inferences drawn from them, show that Defendants knew about 11 the general problem of child labor on certain Ivorian farms and engaged 12 in general commercial transactions with those farmers. Such 13 allegations do not constitute aiding and abetting under international 14 law. Plaintiffs have not alleged that Defendant possessed "knowledge 15 that the[ir] acts . . . assist[ed] the commission of the specific crime 16 of the principal perpetrator." Blagojevic, at ¶ 127. Thus, even if 17 the "knowledge" mens rea standard applies, Plaintiffs' Complaint fails 18 to state a claim upon which relief may be granted.

19 D. SUMMARY OF AIDING AND ABETTING LIABILITY

20 Plaintiffs' First Amended Complaint fails to state a viable cause 21 of action with respect to Defendants' alleged aiding and abetting human 22 rights violations by cocoa farmers in Cote d'Ivoire. Plaintiffs have 23 not alleged facts from which one may plausibly conclude that 24 Defendants' conduct violated a universally accepted and well-defined 25 international law norm. See Sosa, 542 U.S. at 732. Plaintiffs' 26 allegations fail to satisfy either the actus reus or mens rea standards 27 illustrated in the leading international and domestic caselaw that 28

1 discuss aiding and abetting under international law. Accordingly, 2 Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Plaintiffs' cause of action alleging 3 violations of customary international law is GRANTED.

4 E. AGENCY THEORIES

5 As an alternative to the aiding and abetting theories of 6 liability, Plaintiffs also attempt to hold Defendants directly liable 7 as the principals of the Ivorian farmers who allegedly violated 8 Plaintiffs' human rights.

9 As an initial matter, the Court disagrees with Plaintiffs' 10 reliance on domestic-law agency principles. See generally infra Part X 11 (holding that international law, not domestic law, must provide 12 substantive rules of agency attribution). However, the Court also 13 concludes that Plaintiffs' allegations are insufficient even under the 14 domestic agency law cited by Plaintiffs. Plaintiffs cite to cases 15 involving an employer-employee relationship, Quick v. Peoples Bank of 16 Cullman County, 993 F.2d 793, 797 (11th Cir. 1993), an alleged parent-17 subsidiary corporate relationship, Bowoto v. Chevron Texaco Corp., 312 18 F. Supp. 2d 1229, 1241-46 (N.D. Cal. 2004), and a case that offered no 19 substantive discussion whatsoever regarding agency, Aldana v. Del Monte 20 Fresh Produce, N.A., Inc., 416 F.3d 1242 (11th Cir. 2005). (See 21 2/23/09 Opp. at 19.)

22 Plaintiffs insist that Defendants can be liable as principals 23 because "[u]nder general agency rules, a principal is liable for the 24 actions of its agents when the acts are: (1) related to and committed 25 within the course of the agency relationship; (2) committed in 26 furtherance of the business of the principal; and (3) authorized or 27 subsequently acquiesced in by the principal." (2/23/09 Opp. at 19.) 28

1 Plaintiffs assert that their Complaint adequately "allege[s] that 2 Defendants had a long term relationship with their farmers, and 3 provided direction and support. This would allow an inference that the 4 farmers were Defendants' agents. Further, that the Defendants continued 5 to work with and support their farmers even though they had specific 6 knowledge of the farmers' use of forced child labor, would constitute 7 acquiescence or subsequent ratification." (Id.)

8 The Court disagrees with Plaintiffs' analysis. First, the Court 9 concludes that, under Sosa, international law rather than domestic law 10 must provide the relevant body of agency rules. Plaintiffs have failed 11 to identify any international law in cases, treaties, or any other 12 authority that recognizes an agency relationship between a purchaser of 13 goods and a supplier of goods. Furthermore, the Court disagrees with 14 Plaintiffs' assertion that a "long-term" and "exclusive" buyer-supplier 15 relationship transforms an arms-length commercial relationship into an 16 agency relationship in which the buyer is liable for the suppliers' 17 actions.<sup>53</sup> Such a conclusion would be contrary to general principles of

18 19 <sup>53</sup> The Court finds persuasive the illustrations provided in the 20 Restatement (Third) of Agency regarding the basic rules of commercial relationships:

21 10. P Corporation designs and sells athletic footwear using a 22 registered trade name and a registered trademark prominently 23 displayed on each item. P Corporation licenses A Corporation to 24 manufacture and sell footwear bearing P Corporation's trade name 25 and trademark, in exchange for A Corporation's promise to pay 26 royalties. Under the license agreement, P Corporation reserves 27 the right to control the quality of the footwear manufactured 28 under the license. A Corporation enters into a contract with T to purchase rubber. As to the contract with T, A Corporation is not acting as P Corporation's agent, nor is P Corporation the agent of A Corporation by virtue of any obligation it may have to defend and protect its trade name and trademark. P Corporation's right to control the quality of footwear manufactured by A Corporation does not make A Corporation the agent of P Corporation as to the contract with T.

1 agency law and would eviscerate the well-established international law 2 rules discussed supra that limit secondary liability to certain 3 specific situations.

4 Finally, the Court disagrees with Plaintiffs' assertions regarding 5 agency liability because Plaintiffs misstate both the relevant law and 6 the operative allegations of the Complaint. The appropriate standard 7 under federal common law<sup>54</sup> is that an agency relationship is created 8 "when one person (a 'principal') manifests assent to another person (an 9 'agent') that the agent shall act on the principal's behalf and subject 10 to the principal's control, and the agent manifests assent or otherwise 11 consents so to act." Restatement (Third) of Agency § 1.01 (2006); see 12

13 14 11. Same facts as Illustration 10, except that P Corporation and 15 A Corporation agree that A Corporation will negotiate and enter 16 into contracts between P Corporation and retail stores for the 17 sale of footwear manufactured by P Corporation. A Corporation is 18 acting as P Corporation's agent in connection with the 19 contracts. . . .

13 P owns a shopping mall. A rents a retail store in the mall 14 under a lease in which A promises to pay P a percentage of A's 15 monthly gross sales revenue as rent. The lease gives P the right 16 to approve or disapprove A's operational plans for the store. A 17 is not P's agent in operating the store.

18 14. Same facts as Illustration 13, except that A additionally 19 agrees to collect the rent from the mall's other tenants and 20 remit it to P in exchange for a monthly service fee. A is P's 21 agent in collecting and remitting the other tenants' rental 22 payments. A is not P's agent in operating A's store in the mall.
Restatement (Third) of Agency, § 1.01 cmt. g, ill. 10-14.

23 In light of these illustrations, it is noteworthy that 24 Plaintiffs' Complaint fails to include any facts suggesting that 25 Defendants and the Ivorian farmers agreed that the farmers would act 26 as Defendants' agents with respect to Defendants' procurement and 27 maintenance of its labor force (or for any other matters).

26 <sup>54</sup> See United States v. Bonds, 608 F.3d 495, 504-05 (9th Cir. 2010) 27 (suggesting that the Third Restatement is the appropriate source of 28 federal agency law); see also Schmidt v. Burlington Northern and Santa Fe Ry. Co., 605 F.3d 686, 690 n.3 (9th Cir. 2010) (noting that the Third Restatement has "superceded" the Second Restatement).

1 also id. at § 3.01 (“[a]ctual authority . . . is created by a
2 principal’s manifestation [through either words or conduct, see § 1.03] 3 to an agent that, as reasonably understood by the agent, expresses the 4 principal’s assent that the agent take action on the principal’s
5 behalf.” ). Plaintiffs have not even attempted to argue that an agency 6 relationship has been created according to these rules. (See 2/23/09 7 Opp. at 19.) Contrary to Plaintiffs’ conclusory assertions in their 8 Opposition, Plaintiffs have not alleged any facts from which it may be 9 plausibly inferred that Defendants manifested an intent to the Ivorian 10 farmers that the farmers would act on Defendants’ behalf. Nor have 11 Plaintiffs alleged any facts from which it may be plausibly inferred 12 that the Ivorian farmers manifested their assent to Defendants’ control 13 of the farmers’ conduct. Absent such allegations, there is no agency 14 relationship between Defendants and the Ivorian farmers. Accord 15 Bowoto, 312 F. Supp. 2d at 1241 (“To establish actual agency a party 16 must demonstrate the following elements: (1) there must be a 17 manifestation by the principal that the agent shall act for him; (2) 18 the agent must accept the undertaking; and (3) there must be an 19 understanding between the parties that the principal is to be in 20 control of the undertaking. There is no agency relationship where the 21 alleged principal has no right of control over the alleged agent.”) 22 (quotations and citation omitted).

23 Similarly, Plaintiffs’ allegations fail to show that the Ivorian 24 farmers are Defendants’ agents under rules of ratification and 25 acquiescence. “Although a principal is liable when it ratifies an 26 originally unauthorized tort, the principal-agent relationship is still 27 a requisite, and ratification can have no meaning without it.” Batzel 28

1 v. Smith, 333 F.3d 1018, 1036 (9th Cir. 2003) (footnote omitted); see 2 also Restatement (Third of Agency) § 4.03 ("A person may ratify an act 3 if [and only if, see § 4.01(3)(a),] the actor acted or purported to act
4 as an agent on the person's behalf."). In other words, absent a 5 preexisting principal-agent relationship, the concept of "ratification" 6 cannot operate independently to create such a principal-agent 7 relationship.

8 Accordingly, the Court rejects Plaintiffs' arguments that the 9 Defendants are liable for the Ivorian farmers' actions under an agency 10 theory.

11 12 VIII. TORTURE VICTIM PROTECTION ACT

13 Plaintiffs' third cause of action alleges that Defendants aided 14 and abetted acts of torture. This cause of action is brought under 15 both the Alien Tort Statute and the Torture Victim Protection Act, Pub.
16 L. 102-256, 106 Stat. 73 (1992), reprinted in 28 U.S.C.A. § 1350 note.
17 The Torture Victim Protection Act provides:

18 Section 1. Short Title.

19 This Act may be cited as the 'Torture Victim Protection Act of 1991'

20 Sec. 2. Establishment of civil action.

21 (a) Liability.--An individual who, under actual or apparent authority, or color of law, of any foreign nation--

22 (1) subjects an individual to torture shall, in a civil action, be liable for damages to that individual; or 23 (2) subjects an individual to extrajudicial killing shall, in a civil action, be liable for damages to the individual's 24 legal representative, or to any person who may be a claimant in an action for wrongful death.

25 (b) Exhaustion of remedies.--A court shall decline to hear a claim under this section if the claimant has not exhausted adequate and available remedies in the place in which the 26 conduct giving rise to the claim occurred.

27 (c) Statute of limitations.--No action shall be maintained under this section unless it is commenced within 10 years 28 after the cause of action arose.

2       Sec. 3. Definitions.

3       "(a) Extrajudicial killing.--For the purposes of this Act, 4       the term 'extrajudicial killing' means a deliberated killing 5       not authorized by a previous judgment pronounced by a 6       regularly constituted court affording all the judicial 7       guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized 8       peoples. Such term, however, does not include any such 9       killing that, under international law, is lawfully carried 10      out under the authority of a foreign nation.

11      "(b) Torture.--For the purposes of this Act-- 12      "(1) the term 'torture' means any act, directed against an 28 U.S.C.A. § 1350 note.

Defendants argue that the Torture Victim Protection Act supercedes the Alien Tort Statute with respect to torture and related offenses.

This is the approach taken by the divided panel in Enahoro v. Abubakar, 408 F.3d 877, 884-85 (7th Cir. 2005), a much-criticized case<sup>55</sup> which

Relationship Between the Alien Tort Statute and the Torture Victim Protection Act, 156 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1383, 1386 (2008) ("the Seventh Circuit's preclusive interpretation . . . produces an inappropriate result for courts to follow); Ved P. Nanda & David K. Pansius, 2

1 concluded that the Torture Victim Protection Act's statutory exhaustion 2 requirement would be rendered meaningless if plaintiffs could simply 3 plead torture-related violations under customary international law.

4 The Court disagrees with Defendants' assertion. While it is true 5 that the Torture Victim Protection Act "was intended to codify judicial 6 decisions recognizing such a cause of action under the Alien Tort 7 [Statute]," Hilao v. Estate of Marcos, 103 F.3d 767, 778 (9th Cir.
8 1996), there is no clear congressional intent that the Alien Tort 9 Statute cannot also provide a cause of action for torture and related 10 acts. Notably, the Ninth Circuit affirmed a judgment which contained 11 causes of action for torture brought under both the Alien Tort Statute 12 and the Torture Victim Protection Act. See Hilao v. Estate of Marcos, 13 103 F.3d at 777-78.

14 The Court agrees with and adopts the discussion of this question 15 in Bowoto v. Chevron Corp., 557 F. Supp. 2d 1080, 1084-86 (N.D. Cal.
16 2008), and Mujica v. Occidental Petroleum Corp., 381 F. Supp. 2d 1164, 17 1179 n.13 (C.D. Cal. 2005) (explaining that Torture Victim Protection 18 Act was intended to enhance, not limit, remedies available to torture 19 victims, and that "repeals by implication are not favored") (collecting 20 authorities), remanded on other grounds by 564 F.3d 1190, 1192 (9th 21 Cir. 2009) (ordering district court to consider applicability of coexisting."); see also Adhikari v. Daoud & Partners, 697 F. Supp. 2d

3 Comment, Assessing the Proper Relationship Between the Alien Tort 4 Statute and the Torture Victim Protection Act, 156 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1383
5 (2008) (closely examining the question and rejecting Seventh Circuit's 6 contrary conclusion).

7 In any event, even if the Court were to follow the reasoning of 8 the Seventh Circuit in Enahoro, the concerns motivating the Seventh 9 Circuit (namely, the interaction between the Torture Victim Protection 10 Act and the Alien Tort Statute regarding exhaustion of remedies) are 11 not present in the instant case. Defendants have not argued that the 12 Torture Victim Protection Act's statutory exhaustion requirement would 13 be eviscerated if the Court applied the Alien Tort Statute in this 14 case. Accordingly, Enahoro's reasoning is inapposite.

15 A. PLAINTIFFS' ALLEGATIONS FAIL TO STATE A VIABLE CAUSE OF 16 ACTION FOR AIDING AND ABETTING TORTURE

17 The Court assumes for purposes of this Order that the Torture 18 Victim Protection Act creates a cause of action relating to a 19 defendant's act of aiding and abetting torture. Because the Act 20 creates a statutory cause of action, this question is distinct from the 21 common law-based Alien Tort Statute analysis discussed supra. Whereas 22 Alien Tort Statute claims are derived from international law, a Torture 23 Victim Protection Act claim derives from federal statute. The 24 existence of aiding and abetting liability is therefore a matter of 25 statutory interpretation. The Court refrains from engaging in this 26 exercise at the present juncture. See generally Ved P. Nanda & David 27 K. Pansius, 2 Litigation of International Disputes in U.S. Courts, § 28

1 9:9, at nn. 257-29 and accompanying text (2010 supp.) ("In a TVPA case 2 complicity liability would derive from the terms of that statute to the 3 extent that a court may consider the issue addressed in the statute or 4 its legislative history. . . . Under the ATS the cause of action must 5 arise from a norm of international law.").

6 However, even assuming that the Torture Victim Protection Act
7 recognizes aiding and abetting liability, the Court grants Defendants' 8 Motion to Dismiss the Torture Victim Protection Act cause of action for 9 the same reasons that it grants the motion on the common-law 10 international law causes of action brought under the Alien Tort 11 Statute. As discussed supra, Plaintiffs have not alleged sufficient 12 facts to establish a plausible inference that Defendants aided and 13 abetted third parties' torture of Plaintiffs.

14 B. CORPORATE LIABILITY UNDER THE TORTURE VICTIM PROTECTION ACT

15 In addition, the Court grants Defendants' Motion to Dismiss the 16 Torture Victim Protection Act cause of action because Congress only 17 extended liability to natural persons, not corporations.

18 The overwhelming majority of courts have concluded that only 19 natural persons, not corporations, may be held liable under the Torture 20 Victim Protection Act. See Ali Shafi v. Palestinian Authority, 686 F.
21 Supp. 2d 23, 28 (D.D.C. 2010) ("Defendants correctly assert that Ali 22 may not plead a cause of action against non-natural persons under the 23 TVPA."); Bowoto v. Chevron Corp., No. C 99-02506-SI, 2006 WL 2604591, 24 at *1-2 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 22, 2006); Corrie v. Catepillar, Inc., 403 F.

3 Liability Litig., 373 F. Supp. 2d 7, 55-56 (E.D.N.Y. 2005); Arndt v.
4 UBS AG, 342 F. Supp. 2d 132, 141 (E.D.N.Y. 2004); Friedman v. Bayer
5 Corp., No. 99-CV-3675, 1999 WL 33457825, at *2 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 15, 6 1999); Beanal v. Freeport-McMoran, Inc., 969 F. Supp. 362, 381-82 (E.D.
7 La. 1997), aff'd on other grounds, 197 F.3d 161, 169 (5th Cir. 1999) 8 (holding that complaint failed to allege facts sufficient to show that 9 torture occurred); but see Sinaltrinal v. Coca-Cola Co., 256 F. Supp.
10 2d 1345, 1358-59 (S.D. Fla. 2003) (reaching contrary conclusion); 11 Estate of Rodriquez v. Drummond Co., Inc., 256 F. Supp. 2d 1250, 1266-12 67 (N.D. Ala. 2003) (same)

13 The central animating logic behind these decisions is that the Act 14 prohibits individuals from inflicting torture on other individuals.
15 See 28 U.S.C.A. § 1350 note § 2(a)(1) ("An individual who . . .
16 subjects an individual to torture shall, in a civil action, be liable 17 for damages to that individual.") (emphasis added). Because a 18 corporation cannot be tortured, it appears that the Act's use of word 19 "individual" refers only to natural persons, not corporations. As 20 noted in Mujica, corporations are quite obviously incapable of being 21 "tortured":

22 The Court does not believe it would be possible for corporations 23 to be tortured or killed. The Court also does not believe it 24 would be possible for corporations to feel pain and suffering.
25 See Leocal [v. Ashcroft, 543 U.S. 1,] 125 S.Ct. [377,] 382 26 [(2004)] ("When interpreting a statute, we must give words their 'ordinary or natural' meaning."). Thus, the only manner in which the statute does not reach an 'absurd result,' is by excluding corporations from the scope of the statute's liability.

27 Mujica, 381 F. Supp. 2d at 1176.

28 Another strand of reasoning involves reference to the default

1 rules of linguistic interpretation set forth by Congress itself.
2 Congress's Dictionary Act defines "person" as including both 3 "corporation" and "individuals." See 1 U.S.C. § 1 ("In determining the 4 meaning of any Act of Congress, unless the context indicates otherwise 5 - . . . the words 'person' and 'whoever' include corporations, 6 companies, associations, firms, partnerships, societies, and joint 7 stock companies, as well as individuals"). "[T]he Dictionary Act's 8 definition of 'person' implies that the words 'corporations' and 9 'individuals' refer to different things," and that implied meaning 10 should govern as long as the context does not indicate otherwise.
11 United States v. Middleton, 231 F.3d 1207, 1211 (9th Cir. 2000). Here, 12 context supports the implied meaning given in the Dictionary Act - that 13 is, that "individual" refers to "natural persons" - and there is no 14 reason to hold otherwise. Bowoto, 2006 WL 2604591, at *1-2.

15 As persuasive authority in favor of holding corporations liable 16 under the Torture Victim Protection Act, Plaintiffs point to the 17 statement of Sen. Specter, the bill's sponsor, who said that the bill 18 would allow suits against "persons" who were involved in committing 19 torture. (See 2/23/09 Opp. at 22.) This single statement is an 20 insufficient basis for reaching a conclusion that is contrary to basic 21 principles of statutory construction. See generally United States v.
22 Tabacca, 924 F.2d 906, 910-911 (9th Cir. 1991) ("The remarks of a 23 legislator, even those of the sponsoring legislator, will not override 24 the plain meaning of a statute."); see also Weinberger v. Rossi, 456 25 U.S. 25, 35 n.15 (1982) ("The contemporaneous remarks of a sponsor of 26 legislation are not controlling in analyzing legislative history.");
27 Bath Iron Works Corp. v. Director, Office of Workers' Compensation, 506 28

1 U.S. 153, 166 (1993) (where the language of the statute was unambiguous
2 on the issue, the Court gave "no weight" to a single senator's 3 reference during a floor debate in the Senate). Furthermore, no court 4 has relied on Sen. Specter's statement as dispositive; to the extent 5 that courts have relied on the legislative history to show that 6 corporations may be sued, they have concluded that this history "does 7 not reveal an intent to exempt private corporations from liability."
8 Sinaltrinal v. Coca-Cola Co., 256 F. Supp. 2d 1345, 1358-59 (S.D. Fla.
9 2003) (emphasis added); see also Estate of Rodriguez v. Drummond Co., 10 Inc., 256 F. Supp. 2d 1250, 1266-67 (N.D. Ala. 2003) (following 11 Sinaltrinal).<sup>56</sup> But in light of the plain statutory language of the 12 Act, the Court concludes that the majority of courts are correct that 13 the Act does not extend liability to corporations. Congress simply has 14 not provided for corporate liability.

15 C. STATE ACTION

16 As a final matter, the Court grants Defendants' Motion to Dismiss 17 the Torture Victim Protection Act cause of action because Plaintiffs 18 have not adequately alleged "state action" for purposes of the Act.
19 The Act establishes liability where "[a]n individual who, under actual

---

21 <sup>56</sup>The Eleventh Circuit has affirmed both of these decisions and 22 extended liability to corporations, but has never explicitly stated 23 its reasoning for permitting a corporation to be sued under the Act.
24 In Romero v. Drummond Co., Inc., 552 F.3d 1303, 1315 (11th Cir.
25 2008), the court stated that "we are bound by th[e] precedent" of 26 Aldana v. Del Monte Fresh Produce, Inc., 416 F.3d 1242, 1315 (11th 27 Cir. 2005), that a plaintiff may "state[] a claim against a corporate 28 defendant" under the Torture Victim Protection Act. However, the Aldana court did not expressly address the issue. See generally Aldana, 417 F.3d at 1244-53. Later, in Sinaltrainal v. Coca-Cola Co., 578 F.3d 1252, 1263 (11th Cir. 2009), the court suggested that Romero, not Aldana, was the operative precedent regarding corporate liability under the Torture Victim Protection Act.

1 or apparent authority, or color of law, of any foreign nation--
2 subjects an individual to torture." 28 U.S.C.A. note § 2(a)(1)
3 (emphasis added). This statutory provision requires that the principal 4 offender committing torture - here, the Ivorian farmers - was acting 5 under color of law.

6 Unlike the Alien Tort Statute, the Torture Victim Protection Act 7 contains an explicit reference to domestic law to define the state-8 action requirement of the Torture Victim Protection Act. As explained 9 in a recent en banc decision issued by the Second Circuit's decision, 10 "[i]n construing the term 'color of law,' courts are instructed to look 11 to jurisprudence under 42 U.S.C. § 1983." Arar v. Ascroft, 585 F.3d 12 559, 568 (2d Cir. 2009) (en banc) (citing H.R. Rep. No. 367, 102d 13 Cong., 2d Sess., at 5 (1991) reprinted in 1992 U.S.C.C.A.N. 84, 87) 14 (alterations omitted), cert. denied, 130 S.Ct. 3409 (2010).
15 Accordingly, the Court will consider precedents construing both the 16 Torture Victim Protection Act and 42 U.S.C. § 1983.

17 The essence of Plaintiffs' state-action argument is that some 18 farms were owned by government officials, or were protected by 19 government-based security services, or were insulated from government 20 attention through payments to government officials. (FAC ¶¶ 47, 67, 21 73, 77.) Specifically, Plaintiffs allege that "several of the cocoa 22 farms in Cote d'Ivoire from which Defendants source [cocoa] are owned 23 by government officials, whether directly or indirectly, or are 24 otherwise protected by government officials either through the 25 provision of direct security services or through payments made to such 26 officials that allow farms and/or farmer cooperatives to continue the 27 use child labor." (Id. at ¶ 47.) Plaintiffs also assert that the 28

1 farmers' wrongful actions were done with the "implicit sanction of the 2 state" or through "the intentional omission of responsible state 3 officials . . . to act in preventing and/or limiting the trafficking" 4 of child slaves into Cote d'Ivoire. (Id. at ¶ 77.)

5 Plaintiffs assert that these allegations establish a form of 6 "joint action" between the state actors and the private defendants.
7 (2/23/09 Opp. at 23.) Plaintiffs cite to Dennis v. Sparks, 449 U.S.
8 24, 27-28 (1980), which explained that "[p]rivate persons, jointly 9 engaged with state officials in the challenged action, are acting 10 'under color' of law for purposes of § 1983 actions." Dennis involved 11 allegations that a private party had entered into a "corrupt conspiracy 12 involving bribery of [a] judge." The Court explained that "the private 13 parties conspiring with the judge were acting under color of state 14 law." Id. at 28.

15 The "joint-action" principle is further illustrated in a number of 16 Torture Victim Protection Act cases. In Mujica v. Occidental 17 Petroleum, the plaintiffs alleged that the Colombian Air Force, while 18 providing paid-for security services at one of the defendant's oil 19 production facilities and oil pipelines, committed torture by dropping 20 cluster bombs on groups of civilians in a residential area. Mujica, 21 381 F. Supp. 2d at 1168. The court held that these allegations were 22 sufficient to satisfy the Torture Victim Protection Act's requirement 23 that the wrongful conduct be done under color of law.

24 Similarly, in Wiwa v. Royal Dutch Petrol. Co., No. 96 CIV.
25 8386(KMW), 2002 WL 3129887 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 28, 2002), the court held 26 that the allegations were sufficient to satisfy the state action 27 requirement where the plaintiff alleged that the defendants "jointly 28

1 collaborated" with a foreign government "in committing several of the 2 claimed violations of international law." Id. at *14. The court 3 explained that "individuals engaged in a conspiracy with government 4 actors to deprive others of their constitutional rights act 'under 5 color of law' to commit those violations." Id.

6 In Aldana v. Del Monte Fresh Produce, the plaintiffs alleged that 7 they had been taken hostage and were threatened with death during labor 8 negotiations in Guatemala. Aldana, 416 F.3d at 1245. The Eleventh 9 Circuit reversed the district court's dismissal of the Torture Victim 10 Protection Act claims to the extent that the plaintiffs alleged that 11 the local mayor had personally acted as an "one of the armed 12 aggressors" who personally participated in taking the plaintiffs 13 hostage and threatening them with death. Id. at 1249. (The court 14 noted that the private-party defendants were secondarily liable for the 15 mayor's conduct because the mayor was acting "at the urging of [the] 16 Defendants." Id.) Because the mayor was personally involved in the 17 underlying wrongdoing, the plaintiffs had adequately alleged state 18 action. Id.

19 In contrast to the allegations involving the mayor, the Aldana 20 court held that there was no state action where the government provided 21 "registration and toleration" of the organizations responsible for the 22 wrongful acts. Id. at 1248. The court cited the Supreme Court's 23 decision in Moose Lodge No. 107 v. Irvis, 407 U.S. 163, 175-78 (1972), 24 in which the Court held that a "state's alcohol licensing and 25 regulatory scheme did not transform a private club with a liquor 26 license into a state actor." Aldana, 416 F.3d at 1248.

27 In Sinaltrainal v. Coca-Cola, the plaintiffs alleged that private 28

1 "paramilitary forces" engaged in torture. The Eleventh Circuit
2 explained that "[m]ere toleration of the paramilitary forces does not 3 transform such forces' acts into state acts." Sinaltrainal, 578 F.3d 4 at 1270. Relying on the pleading rules as construed in Iqbal, the 5 court rejected the plaintiffs' conclusory allegations that "the 6 paramilitary are 'permitted to exist' and are 'assisted' by the 7 Colombian government." Id. at 1266. The court explained that the 8 plaintiffs offered only the "naked allegation the paramilitaries were 9 in a symbiotic relationship with the Colombian government and thus were 10 state actors," and "absent any factual allegations to support this 11 legal conclusion," the motion to dismiss was properly granted. Id.

12 The present case, in contrast to Dennis, Mujica, Wiwa, and the 13 portion of Aldana addressing the mayor's conduct, does not involve any 14 allegations that Ivorian government officials jointly conspired or 15 participated with the farmers who were directly engaged in wrongdoing.
16 Rather, Plaintiffs allege in a wholly conclusory fashion that the 17 Ivorian government somehow "protected" the farmers and otherwise 18 allowed them "to continue to use child labor." (FAC ¶ 47.) Like the 19 complaint in Sinaltrainal, Plaintiffs' Complaint lacks any factual 20 allegations showing that the Ivorian government jointly participated in 21 the underlying human rights abuses, as was the case with the mayor in 22 Aldana and the corrupt judge in Dennis. See also Romero, 552 F.3d at 23 1317 (granting summary judgment to defendant because "proof of a 24 general relationship [between the Colombian government and alleged 25 wrongdoer] is not enough. The relationship must involve the subject of 26 the complaint. . . . [T]he [evidence] do[es] not even suggest that the 27 Colombian military was involved in those crimes."); Alomang v.

1 Freeport-McMoran Inc., Civ. A. No. 96-2139, 1996 WL 601431 (E.D. La.
2 Oct. 17, 1996) (plaintiff's complaint failed to satisfy state action 3 requirement because it "does not explicitly link the alleged human 4 rights violations to the alleged presence of Indonesian troops at the 5 Grasberg Mine site").

6 To the extent that Plaintiffs allege that Ivorian government 7 officials owned the farms on which the violations took place, it is 8 well established that government officials' private conduct does not 9 satisfy the state action requirement. See, e.g., Screws v. United 10 States, 325 U.S. 91, 111 (1945) ("acts of officers in the ambit of 11 their personal pursuits are plainly excluded . . . [from] the words 12 'under color of any law'"); see also Gritchen v. Collier, 254 F.3d 807, 13 812 n.6 (9th Cir. 2001) (collecting cases). Plaintiffs fail to allege 14 any facts establishing that the Ivorian farms were operated by or for 15 the benefit of the government.

16 Finally, the Court rejects Plaintiffs' argument that these state 17 action issues should be left to the summary judgment stage of 18 litigation rather than the motion to dismiss stage. Plaintiffs' 19 authority predates the Supreme Court's clear authority in Twombly and 20 Iqbal, requiring plaintiffs to allege facts supporting their claim for 21 relief. The cases cited by Plaintiffs apply a different legal 22 standard. See National Coalition Government of Union of Burma v.
23 Unocal, Inc., 176 F.R.D. 329, 346 (C.D. Cal. 1997) ("[T]he Court 24 considers Unocal's argument that plaintiffs cannot possibly prevail on 25 a joint action theory based on the allegations of the complaint.")
26 (emphasis added). Admittedly, it is somewhat difficult for the Court 27 to analyze the sufficiency of Plaintiffs' legal theory at the present 28

1 stage of litigation - but that is only because the Complaint contains 2 conclusory assertions rather than factual allegations. On that basis 3 alone, the Motion to Dismiss must be granted.

4 D. SUMMARY OF TORTURE VICTIM PROTECTION ACT

5 Accordingly, the Court concludes that: Plaintiffs' Complaint fails 6 to allege sufficient facts from which it may be reasonably inferred 7 that Defendants aided and abetted torture; corporations cannot be held 8 liable under the Torture Victim Protection Act because the statute 9 precludes such a result; and Plaintiffs' Complaint fails to allege 10 sufficient facts from which it may be reasonably inferred that the 11 Ivorian farmers acted under "color of law."
12

13 IX. STATE-LAW CAUSES OF ACTION

14 Plaintiffs' Complaint alleges four causes of action under 15 California law: breach of contract, negligence, unjust enrichment, and 16 unfair business practices. Plaintiffs concede that the Ninth Circuit's 17 decision in Doe I v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 572 F.3d 677 (9th Cir.
18 2009), forecloses the contract and negligence claims. (See 8/6/09 Opp.
19 at 2.)<sup>57</sup>

20 A. UNJUST ENRICHMENT

21 With respect to the unjust enrichment cause of action, Plaintiffs 22 allege that:
23

---

24 <sup>57</sup> Doe I v. Wal-Mart Stores addressed causes of action arising out of 25 Wal-Mart's public relations statements about its human rights 26 standards (it had issued a "code of conduct" regarding its labor 27 practices). The court rejected the plaintiffs' contract and 28 negligence claims arising out of the code of conduct because Wal-Mart was an indirect purchaser of the goods manufactured by the laborer-plaintiffs. As Plaintiff concede, the same type of analysis applies in the present case.

1 As a result of the forced labor practices utilized by farms and/or 2 farmer cooperatives from which Defendants sourced cocoa beans, 3 Defendants received benefits by being able to purchase cocoa beans 4 from such farms at significantly lower prices as the farms' total 5 labor costs were greatly diminished by reliance on forced child 6 labor. Defendants' conduct thereby constitutes unjust enrichment
7 and Defendants are under a duty of restitution to the Former Child 8 Slave Plaintiffs for the benefits received therefrom.

9 (FAC ¶¶ 90-91.)

10 A thorough and relevant discussion of California's law of unjust 11 enrichment appears in Doe I v. Wal-Mart Stores:

12 We turn finally to Plaintiffs' claim of unjust enrichment.
13 Plaintiffs allege that Wal-Mart was unjustly enriched at 14 Plaintiffs' expense by profiting from relationships with suppliers 15 that Wal-Mart knew were engaged in substandard labor practices.
16 Unjust enrichment is commonly understood as a theory upon which 17 the remedy of restitution may be granted. See 1 GEORGE E. PALMER, LAW 18 OF RESTITUTION § 1.1 (1st ed. 1978 & Supp. 2009); Restatement of 19 Restitution § 1 (1937) ("A person who has been unjustly enriched 20 at the expense of another is required to make restitution to the 21 other."). California's approach to unjust enrichment is consistent 22 with this general understanding: "The fact that one person 23 benefits another is not, by itself, sufficient to require 24 restitution. The person receiving the benefit is required to make 25 restitution only if the circumstances are such that, as between 26 the two individuals, it is unjust for the person to retain it."
27 First Nationwide Sav. v. Perry, 11 Cal.App.4th 1657, 15
28 Cal.Rptr.2d 173, 176 (1992) (emphasis in original).

The lack of any prior relationship between Plaintiffs and Wal-Mart precludes the application of an unjust enrichment theory here. See Smith v. Pac. Props. & Dev. Corp., 358 F.3d 1097, 1106 (9th Cir.2004) (noting that a party generally may not seek to disgorge another's profits unless "a prior relationship between the parties subject to and benefitting from disgorgement originally resulted in unjust enrichment"). Plaintiffs essentially seek to disgorge profits allegedly earned by Wal-Mart at Plaintiffs' expense; however, we have already determined that Wal-Mart is not Plaintiffs' employer, and we see no other plausible basis upon which the employee of a manufacturer, without more, may obtain restitution from one who purchases goods from that manufacturer. That is, the connection between Plaintiffs and Wal-Mart here is simply too attenuated to support an unjust enrichment claim. See, e.g., Sperry v. Crompton Corp., 8 N.Y.3d 204, 831 N.Y.S.2d 760, 863 N.E.2d 1012, 1018 (2007) (holding that "the connection between the purchaser of tires and the producers of chemicals used in the rubbermaking process is simply too attenuated to support" the purchaser's claim of unjust enrichment).

Doe I v. Wal-Mart Stores, 572 F.3d at 684-85.

1 The Ninth Circuit's observations about the "attenuated" nature of 2 the relationship between the plaintiffs and the defendant applies with 3 equal force in the present case. Plaintiffs assert that Doe v. Wal-4 Mart is not controlling because the present case involves a "long term 5 exclusive relationship" between Defendants and the "specific farmers 6 that enslaved Plaintiffs and other children." (8/6/09 Opp. at 2.) 7 However, Plaintiffs fail to identify any legal authority for their 8 conclusion that Defendants' long-term exclusive relationship with the 9 Ivorian farmers constitutes a "prior relationship" between Plaintiffs 10 and Defendants. In Doe v. Wal-Mart, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the 11 dismissal of an unjust enrichment claim where there was no "prior 12 relationship" between the plaintiffs and defendant, and Plaintiffs have 13 failed to identify any such relationship between Plaintiffs and 14 Defendants in this case. The Motion to Dismiss the unjust enrichment 15 cause of action is therefore granted.

16 B. UNFAIR BUSINESS PRACTICES

17 All Plaintiffs - both the Malian child-laborer Plaintiffs and the 18 Global Exchange Plaintiffs - allege unfair competition violations under 19 Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 17200 et seq. The basic allegations are that 20 Defendants engaged in fraudulent and deceptive business practices by 21 making materially false misrepresentations and omissions that:

22 den[ie]d the use of child slaves and/or [] create[d] the false 23 impression that the problem of child slaves is being adequately 24 addressed, either directly by Defendants and/or through their 25 various trade associations, including that an independent, credible system of monitoring, certification, and verification would be in place by July 1, 2005.

26 (FAC ¶ 95.) Defendants also allegedly engaged in unfair business 27 practices by "us[ing] . . . unfair, illegal, and forced child labor" to 28 gain an unfair business advantage over competitors. (FAC ¶ 96.)

1                   1. ALLEGATIONS BY FORMER CHILD LABORERS

2           The child-laborer Plaintiffs fail to allege any facts showing that 3 they suffered harm on account of Defendants' conduct in California.

4           Plaintiffs correctly recognize that the Unfair Competition Law 5 allows claims by "non-California plaintiffs when the alleged misconduct
6 or injuries occurred in California." (2/23/09 Opp. at 36 (collecting 7 cases) (emphasis added).) California courts have consistently held 8 that out-of-state plaintiffs may not bring Unfair Competition Law 9 claims for out-of-state misconduct or injuries. See, e.g., Churchill 10 Village, L.L.C. v. General Elec. Co., 169 F. Supp. 2d 1119, 126 (N.D.
11 Cal. 2000) ("section 17200 does not support claims by non-California 12 residents where none of the alleged misconduct or injuries occurred in 13 California") (citing Norwest Mortgage, Inc. v. Superior Court, 72 Cal.
14 App. 4th 214 (1999)), aff'd, 361 F.3d 566 (9th Cir. 2004).

15           Plaintiffs fail to articulate any theory through which the child-16 laborer Plaintiffs were harmed by Defendants' California-based conduct.
17 Plaintiffs assert that "Plaintiffs allege that Defendants have been 18 making false and misleading statements in California" (2/23/09 Opp. at 19 36), but Plaintiffs fail to explain how the child-laborer Plaintiffs 20 were harmed by those false and misleading statements.

21           Absent allegations that the child-laborer Plaintiffs suffered 22 injuries based on Defendants' conduct in California, the Unfair 23 Competition Law claims of the child-laborer Plaintiffs are dismissed.
24 See Jane Doe I v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., No. CV 05-7307 AG (MANx), 2007
25 WL 5975664, at *6 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 30, 2007) (holding that no "case 26 supports finding an injury in fact in a consumer deception case when 27 the plaintiff is not a consumer. Plaintiffs have not shown any legal 28

1 authority for such an extension of a consumer protection law.”).<sup>58</sup>

2 2. ALLEGATIONS BY GLOBAL EXCHANGE

3 The Court declines to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over 4 Global Exchange’s Unfair Competition Law claims against Defendants.
5 Global Exchange’s claims relate to Defendants’ marketing and sales 6 conduct, not Defendants’ alleged aiding and abetting human rights 7 abuses. (See FAC ¶¶ 90-91.) The Court concludes that Global 8 Exchange’s Unfair Competition Law claims are not “so related to claims 9 in the action within such original jurisdiction that they form part of 10 the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States 11 Constitution.” 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a). “Nonfederal claims are part of 12 the same ‘case’ as federal claims when they ‘derive from a common 13 nucleus of operative fact’ and are such that a plaintiff ‘would 14 ordinarily be expected to try them in one judicial proceeding.’” 15 Trustees of Construction Industry and Laborers Health and Welfare Trust 16 v. Desert Valley Landscape & Maintenance, Inc., 333 F.3d 923, 925 (9th 17 Cir. 2003) (quoting Finley v. United States, 490 U.S. 545, 549 (1989)).
18 Here, Global Exchange’s claims do not “derive from a common nucleus of 19 operative fact” as the child-laborers’ claims. See id. at 925.

20 The Court also concludes that even if supplemental jurisdiction 21 were appropriate under 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a), the Court would decline to 22 exercise supplemental jurisdiction because “the claim raises a novel or 23 complex issue of State law.” 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)(1); see also Medrano 24 v. City of Los Angeles, 973 F.2d 1499, 1506 (9th Cir. 1992) (affirming 25 dismissal of claims involving “complicated state law issues”).

<sup>58</sup> The Doe v. Wal-Mart plaintiffs did not appeal this portion of the district court’s holding.

1 California's Unfair Competition Law is in a state of flux and the Court 2 concludes that the state courts, not federal courts, should resolve the 3 statute's uncertainties. See generally Clayworth v. Pfizer, Inc., 49 4 Cal. 4th 758 (2010); In re Tobacco II Cases, 46 Cal. 4th 298 (2009); 5 see also Janda v. T-Mobile USA, Inc., No. 09-15770, 2010 WL 1849028, at 6 *2 (9th Cir. May 10, 2010) ("In the context of a UCL consumer claim it 7 is unclear whether a plaintiff must (1) show that the harm to the 8 consumer of a particular practice outweighs its utility to defendant, 9 or (2) allege unfairness that is tethered to some legislatively 10 declared policy.") (citations and quotations omitted) (citable pursuant 11 to Fed. R. App. P. 32.1(a); 9th Cir. R. 36-3(b)).<sup>59</sup>

12 In addition, the Court would also decline to exercise supplemental 13 jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c)(3). See, e.g., Construction 14 Industry and Laborers Health and Welfare Trust, 333 F.3d at 926 ("we 15 [have] held that it was appropriate for the district court to decline 16 jurisdiction over the supplemental state claims because the federal 17 claim had proven to be unfounded.").

18 Although Defendants did not argue for the dismissal of Global 19 Exchange's claims on jurisdictional grounds, "[c]ourts have an 20 independent obligation to determine whether subject-matter jurisdiction 21 exists." Hertz Corp. v. Friend, 559 U.S. ___, 130 S.Ct. 1181, 1193 22 (2010) ((citing Arbaugh v. Y & H Corp., 546 U.S. 500, 514 (2006)).
23 Here, the Court concludes that subject matter jurisdiction does not 24 exist because Global Exchange's claims are not part of the same "case

25
26 <sup>59</sup> The Court further notes that the precise basis of Plaintiffs' 27 Unfair Competition Law claim is unclear given the paucity of the 28 factual allegations. It is unclear whether Plaintiffs' claims are governed by cases discussing injuries to competitors or by cases discussing injuries to consumers.

1 or controversy." Furthermore, even if subject matter jurisdiction 2 would be permissible under 28 U.S.C. § 1367, the Court exercises its 3 discretion to decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction. See 4 Estate of Amergi v. The Palestinian Authority, __ F.3d __, 2010 WL
5 2898991, at *14-15 (11th Cir. 2010) (affirming district court's 6 dismissal of supplemental wrongful-death claim where federal claims 7 were premised on Alien Tort Statute).

8 Plaintiffs have not pled any alternative bases other than 28 9 U.S.C. § 1367 that would support subject matter jurisdiction. Although 10 they assert that jurisdiction is proper under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 (see FAC 11 ¶ 6), they have failed to allege the citizenship of the individual 12 members of Global Exchange. See, e.g., Stark v. Abex Corp., 407 F.
13 Supp. 2d 930, 934 (N.D. Ill. 2005) (plaintiff bears burden of showing 14 complete diversity between plaintiff and individual members of 15 defendant trade association); see generally Walter W. Jones, 16 Annotation, Determination of citizenship of unincorporated 17 associations, for federal diversity of citizenship purposes, in actions 18 by or against such associations, 14 A.L.R. Fed. 849 (1973, 2010 supp.).
19 Plaintiffs bear the burden of alleging diversity, and they have failed 20 to meet this burden. See Bautista v. Pan American World Airlines, 21 Inc., 828 F.2d 546, 552 (9th Cir. 1987). Plaintiffs may amend their 22 Complaint to remedy this deficiency. See Snell v. Cleveland, Inc., 316 23 F.3d 822, 828 n.6 (9th Cir. 2002). However, it appears that Plaintiffs 24 are likely fail on this ground because by their own admission Plaintiff 25 Global Exchange is based in California and Defendant Nestle USA is 26 headquartered in California. (FAC ¶¶ 17-19.)

1 X. CORPORATE LIABILITY UNDER THE ALIEN TORT STATUTE

2 Although the foregoing discussion resolves Plaintiffs' 3 international law claims in Defendants' favor, the Court wishes to 4 address an issue that was fully briefed for the Court and will require 5 further attention if Plaintiffs elect to file an amended complaint.

6 Defendants argue that international law does not extend liability 7 to corporations. (2/9/09 Mot. at 5-6.) With a single exception, this 8 argument has been uniformly rejected or ignored by other courts. This 9 Court, however, agrees with Defendants. For the following reasons, the 10 Court concludes that international law does not recognize corporate 11 liability for violations of international law. Accordingly, the Court 12 concludes that the Alien Tort Statute, as interpreted in Sosa, does not 13 recognize an international law cause of action for corporate violations 14 of international law.

15 A. SOSA'S REQUIREMENTS AND INTERNATIONAL LAW

16 First and foremost, the Court is guided by the choice-of-law 17 principles enunciated in Sosa: federal common law (actionable under 18 this Court's jurisdiction conferred by the Alien Tort Statute) only 19 recognizes causes of action derived from (1) universal and (2) well-20 defined norms of (3) international law. Sosa, 542 U.S. at 725 21 ("[C]ourts should require any claim based on the present-day law of 22 nations to rest on a norm of international character accepted by the 23 civilized world and defined with a specificity comparable to the 24 features of the 18th-century paradigms we have recognized."). Thus, 25 this Court must rely on international rather than domestic law; and 26 must rely on norms that are universally accepted by a consensus of 27 civilized nations, rather than norms that are accepted by a select 28

1 group of nations; and, finally, the Court must rely on definite legal 2 standards, not disputed or uncertain ones. See Sosa, 542 U.S. at 738 3 n.30 (noting "our demanding standard of definition").

4 In undertaking an analysis of whether Sosa permits suits to be 5 brought against corporate defendants, other federal courts appear to be 6 pushed and pulled by two opposing concerns. First is the Sosa Court's 7 observation that "the First Congress did not pass the ATS as a 8 jurisdictional convenience to be placed on the shelf for use by a 9 future Congress or state legislature that might, someday, authorize the 10 creation of causes of action or itself decide to make some element of 11 the law of nations actionable for the benefit of foreigners." Sosa, 12 542 U.S. at 719. In order to prevent the Alien Tort Statute from 13 "lying fallow indefinitely," see id., lower courts occasionally appear 14 eager to entertain Alien Tort Statute claims. Perhaps these courts are 15 guided by Chief Justice Marshall's declaration that every "individual 16 who considers himself injured, has a right to resort to the laws . . .
17 for a remedy." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 166 (1803).
18 To these courts, it would be inequitable, and perhaps even a bit 19 unseemly, to bar the courthouse doors simply because a particular 20 international law norm is not quite definite enough, or is not 21 recognized by a sufficient number of civilized nations as applying to 22 corporations.

23 In seeking to open the courthouse doors to Alien Tort Statute 24 litigants, courts have run up against the second major concern raised 25 by Sosa: courts are prohibited from being "aggressive" or "creativ[e]" 26 in interpreting international law, because "Congress intended the ATS 27 to furnish jurisdiction for a relatively modest set of actions alleging 28

1 violations of the law of nations." Sosa, 542 U.S. at 720, 726, 728
2 (emphasis added). The emphasis must be placed on the word modest.
3 According to the Supreme Court, Congress has implicitly commanded to 4 the courts that there must be a "restrained conception of the 5 discretion a federal court should exercise in considering a new cause 6 of action" under international law. Id. at 725. As the Court 7 explained, lower courts must exercise "caution" when identifying 8 actionable legal theories.<sup>60</sup> The Court further stated that it was 9 imposing a "high bar to new private causes of action for violating 10 international law," and that courts must exercise "vigilant 11 doorkeeping" in allowing a "narrow class" of appropriate cases. Id. at 12 727, 729.

13 Sosa's repeated use of words like "caution" and "modest[y]" is 14 particularly telling in light of the Court's discussion of the 15 evolution in judicial thinking toward the common law. In the past, the 16 common law was "found or discovered" by courts; but today we 17 acknowledge that the common law is "made or created" by judges through 18 their exercise of "a substantial element of discretionary judgment in 19 the decision." Id. at 725-26. In order to restrain this judicial 20 discretion, "the general practice has been to look for legislative 21 guidance before exercising innovative authority over substantive law." 22 Id. at 726. As the Court explained, "we now tend to understand common 23 law not as a discoverable reflection of universal reason but, in a 24 positivistic way, as a product of human choice." Id. at 729.

25 Here, the "product of human choice" to which the Court must defer 26

---

27 <sup>60</sup> The Sosa majority uses the word "caution" (occasionally modified to 28 read "great caution") five separate times. Id. at 725, 727, 728.

1 is the Alien Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1350. And as explained by Sosa, 2 this statute requires courts to look abroad to "f[ind] or discover[]" 3 only those international legal principles that are universal and well- 4 defined. Domestic federal courts are simply not authorized to create 5 new international law, nor are they authorized to push the boundaries 6 of existing international law beyond those that have been defined by 7 other authorities. Notably, this narrowly defined, positivistic view 8 is in accord with the modern conception of international law as being a 9 product of affirmative human choices rather than a form of "natural 10 law" that exists somewhere in the ether. See, e.g., The Case of the 11 S.S. "Lotus", P.C.I.J., Ser. A., No. 10, 1927, at 18 ("The rules of law 12 binding upon States therefore emanate from their own free will as 13 expressed in conventions or by usages generally accepted as expressing 14 principles of law and established in order to regulate the relations 15 between these co-existing independent communities or with a view to the 16 achievement of common aims.").

17 Accordingly, the Supreme Court concluded that the appropriate 18 source of law under the Alien Tort Statute is well-defined, 19 universally-accepted international law. In order to determine the 20 details of this source of law, it is necessary to apply the three-21 tiered approach articulated by the Supreme Court in The Paquete Habana, 22 175 U.S. at 700, codified by American academics in the Restatement 23 (Third) of Foreign Relations, § 102, and adopted as the substantive 24 foundation for the primary contemporary authority on international law, 25 the International Court of Justice, see ICJ Statute, art. 38. The 26 central sources of law are treaties and customary international law; by 27 way of analogy, these two bodies of law may be viewed respectively as 28

1 something like the statutes and common law in our domestic system. The 2 secondary body of law is the gap-filling "general principles of law 3 common to the major legal systems." Restatement (Third) of Foreign 4 Relations, § 102(4) & n.7; see also ICJ Statute, art. 38(1)(c) ("the 5 general principles of law recognized by civilized nations").<sup>61</sup>

6 With those three sources of international law in mind, it is 7 important to refocus on Sosa's directive that lower courts may only 8 apply international law that is universally accepted and well-defined.
9 Notably, in addition to this general description of the Alien Tort 10 Statute, the Supreme Court in Sosa also stated that lower courts must 11 specifically examine "whether international law extends the scope of 12 liability for a violation of a given norm to the perpetrator being 13 sued, if the defendant is a private actor such as a corporation or 14 individual." Sosa, 542 U.S. at 732 n.20. Thus, in order to address 15 Defendants' argument that corporations are not liable under the Alien 16 Tort Statute for violations of international law, the Court concludes 17 that the correct approach under Sosa is to determine whether universal, 18 well-defined international law "extends the scope of liability for a 19 violation of a given norm to . . . corporation[s]." See Sosa, 542 U.S.
20 at 732 n.20.

21 After Sosa, it is appropriate to look to international law rather 22 than domestic law to provide standards governing corporate liability, 23 agency attribution, joint venture theories, piercing the corporate 24 veil, and the like. Some might argue that corporate liability can be 25

26 <sup>61</sup> Secondary authorities are recognized as "as subsidiary means for 27 the determination of rules of law." ICJ Statute, art. 38(1)(d).
28 Secondary authorities are not themselves a source of international law. See id.

1 provided by operation of "federal common law." See, e.g., In re Agent
2 Orange, 373 F. Supp. 2d at 59 ("In any event, even if it were not true 3 that international law recognizes corporations as defendants, they 4 still could be sued under the ATS. . . . [T]he Supreme Court made clear 5 that an ATS claim is a federal common law claim and it is a bedrock 6 tenet of American law that corporations can be held liable for their 7 torts.") (quotation omitted). However, such an approach improperly 8 superimposes American legal rules on top of international law norms, 9 which directly contravenes Sosa's insistence that courts must determine 10 "whether international law extends the scope of liability for a 11 violation of a given norm to the perpetrator being sued." Sosa, 542 12 U.S. at 732 n.20.

13 The following example will illustrate the logic animating the 14 Court's conclusion that international law, not domestic common law, 15 must provide for corporate liability. At the time the Alien Tort 16 Statute was enacted, the common law included a rule known as 17 "coverture," which treated husbands and wives as a single legal entity.
18 See generally Samantha Ricci, Note, Rethinking Women and the 19 Constitution: An Historical Argument for Recognizing Constitutional 20 Flexibility with Regards to Women in the New Republic, 16 Wm. & Mary J.
21 Women & L. 205, 212-21 (2009). As explained by Blackstone: "By 22 marriage, the husband and wife are one person in law: that is, the very 23 being or legal existence of the woman is suspended during the marriage, 24 or at least is incorporated and consolidated into that of the husband: 25 under whose wing, protection, and cover, she performs every thing; and 26 is therefore called in our law-french a feme-covert; is said to be 27 covert-baron, or under the protection and influence of her husband, her 28

1 baron, or lord; and her condition during her marriage is called her 2 coverture." Blackstone, 1 Commentaries, Ch. 15. Under this doctrine 3 of coverture, according to one study of criminal records in 4 Pennsylvania, "[i]n a fifty-year span between 1750 and 1800, 276 wives 5 were prosecuted alongside their husbands, and 266 other wives were 6 charged independently with the same crime their spouse had committed."
7 Ricci, Rethinking Women and the Constitution, 16 Wm. & Mary J. Women & 8 L. at 214 (citing G.S. Rowe, Femes Covert and Criminal Prosecution in 9 Eighteenth-Century Pennsylvania, 32 Am. J. L. Hist. 138, 142 (1988)).
10 In other words, women could be - and, based on the historical record, 11 apparently were - held legally responsible for acts committed by their 12 husbands.

13 In contrast to the common law rules, Blackstone noted, coverture 14 did not exist in civil law countries. Blackstone, 1 Commentaries, Ch.
15 15. In those countries, "the husband and wife are considered as two 16 distinct persons; and may have separate estates, contracts, debts, and 17 injuries: and therefore, in our ecclesiastical courts, a woman may sue 18 and be sued without her husband." Id.

19 In light of these clear distinctions between the common law 20 tradition and the civil law tradition, it would be quite inappropriate 21 for a United States court to apply principles of coverture under the 22 Alien Tort Statute. No one could reasonably argue that United States 23 courts should impose American views of marital relations on all 24 international wrongdoers. There is no authority in international law 25 allowing for the wife of a hostis humanis generis to be held equally 26 liable for her husband's wrongdoing, and it would be judicial 27 imperialism at its worst for American courts to inject coverture into 28

1 the Alien Tort Statute absent some clear authorization to do so from 2 either Congress or international law.

3 Of course, coverture no longer exists in domestic law, so there is 4 little risk that courts will engage in such absurdity. But the purpose 5 of this discussion is to illustrate the nature of agency attribution in 6 a circumstance that is much less familiar than corporate liability, 7 joint venture liability, and general principal-agent liability. See 8 generally Blackstone 1 Commentaries Chs. 14-17 (discussing four types 9 of agency relationships: master-servant, husband-wife, parent-child, 10 and guardian-ward). Although no Alien Tort Statute court would think 11 it appropriate to hold a wife liable for her husband's wrongdoing based 12 on idiosyncratic domestic rules such as coverture, Alien Tort Statute 13 courts routinely apply domestic conceptions of agency liability with 14 respect to corporations, joint venturers, and others who have entered 15 into commercial principal-agent relationships. Such an approach is, in 16 this Court's view, improper. Under Sosa, corporate liability and other 17 types of agency liability must be created by international law. And as 18 the following discussion demonstrates, there is not a well-defined 19 consensus regarding corporate liability in international law.

20 B. OTHER COURTS' CONCLUSIONS

21 Despite the stringent standards set forth in Sosa, domestic courts 22 have almost uniformly concluded that corporations may be held liable 23 for violations of international law. See Romero v. Drummond Co., Inc., 24 552 F.3d 1303, 1315 (11th Cir. 2008) ("The text of the Alien Tort 25 Statute provides no express exception for corporations, and the law of 26 this Circuit is that this statute grants jurisdiction from complaints 27 of torture against corporate defendants.") (citations omitted);
28

1 Khulumani v. Barclay Nat. Bank Ltd., 504 F.3d 254, 282 (2d Cir. 2007)
2 (Katzmann, J., concurring) ("the issue of whether corporations may be 3 held liable under the Alien Tort Statute is indistinguishable from the 4 question of whether private individuals may be"); Al-Quraishi v.
5 Nakhla, __ F. Supp. 2d __, 2010 WL 3001986, at *39-41 (D. Md. 2010); In 6 re XE Services Alien Tort Litigation, 665 F. Supp. 2d 569, 588 (E.D.
7 Va. 2009) ("Nothing in the ATS or Sosa may plausibly be read to 8 distinguish between private individuals and corporations."); In re 9 South African Apartheid, 617 F. Supp. 2d at 254-55 ("On at least nine 10 separate occasions, the Second Circuit has addressed ATCA cases against 11 corporations without ever hinting-much less holding-that such cases are 12 barred. . . . [T]his Court is bound by the decisions of the Second 13 Circuit."); Arias v. Dyncorp, 517 F. Supp. 2d 221, 227 (D.D.C. 2007) 14 ("It is clear that the ATCA may be used against corporations acting 15 under 'color of state law,' or for a handful of private acts, such as 16 piracy and slave trading.") (alterations omitted); Bowoto v. Chevron 17 Corp., No. C 99-02506 SI, 2006 WL 2455752, at *9 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 22, 18 2006) ("The dividing line for international law has traditionally 19 fallen between states and private actors. Once this line has been 20 crossed and an international norm has become sufficiently well 21 established to reach private actors, there is very little reason to 22 differentiate between corporations and individuals."); Presbyterian 23 Church of Sudan v. Talisman Energy Inc., 374 F. Supp. 2d 331, 335-37
24 (S.D.N.Y. 2005); In re Agent Orange Prod. Liab. Litig., 373 F. Supp. 2d 25 7, 58-59 (E.D.N.Y. 2005) ("Limiting civil liability to individuals 26 while exonerating the corporation directing the individual's action 27 through its complex operations and changing personnel makes little 28

1 sense in today's world." ). Other courts have held corporations liable
2 without specifically addressing the issue. See Abdullahi v. Pfizer, 3 Inc., 562 F.3d 163 (2d Cir. 2007); Aldana v. Del Monte Fresh Produce, 4 N.A., Inc., 416 F.3d 1242 (11th Cir. 2005); John Roe I v. Bridgestone
5 Corp., 492 F. Supp. 2d 988 (S.D. Ind. 2007); Mujica v. Occidental 6 Petroleum Corp., 381 F. Supp. 2d 1164 (C.D. Cal. 2005).

7 The two most thorough opinions on this question were issued by a 8 pair of district courts in the Second Circuit. In Presbyterian Church 9 of Sudan v. Talisman Energy, Inc., 244 F.Supp.2d 289 (S.D.N.Y. 2003), 10 and In re Agent Orange Product Liability Litig., 373 F. Supp. 2d 7
11 (E.D.N.Y. 2005), Judge Schwartz and Judge Weinstein respectively 12 discussed corporate liability in detail and concluded that corporations 13 may be held liable for violating international law.<sup>62</sup> Many other courts 14 have relied almost exclusively on the reasoning employed by these two 15 decisions. See, e.g., In re XE Services, 665 F. Supp. 2d at 588; In re 16 South African Apartheid, 617 F. Supp. 2d at 255 ("[I]n Presbyterian 17 Church of Sudan v. Talisman Energy, Inc., Judge Denise Cote [sic] of 18 the Southern District of New York wrote two lengthy and persuasive 19 explanations of the basis for corporate liability in ATCA cases. This 20 Court need not repeat her analysis.") (footnote omitted); Bowoto, 2006

21
22 <sup>62</sup> Shortly before passing away, Judge Schwartz wrote the initial 23 Presbyterian Church of Sudan opinion addressing corporate liability.
24 The case was transferred to Judge Cote. Following Sosa, Judge Cote 25 reaffirmed the validity of Judge Schwartz's reasoning and added a few 26 additional observations. See Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 374 F.
27 Supp. 2d at 335 ("The 2003 Opinion meticulously demonstrated that 28 corporations may be held liable under international law for violations of jus cogens norms, citing Second Circuit and other federal precedent, as well as a wide array of international law sources."). The Court refers to Judge Schwartz's opinion as Presbyterian Church of Sudan I and Judge Cote's opinion as Presbyterian Church of Sudan II.

1 WL 2455752, at *9. Accordingly, this Court's analysis focuses heavily 2 on the authorities and reasoning contained in Presbyterian Church of 3 Sudan and In re Agent Orange.

4 Having examined the reasoning of those two cases and related 5 authorities, the Court concludes there is no well-defined international 6 consensus regarding corporate liability for violating international 7 human rights norms. Despite the weight of domestic authority 8 supporting that conclusion, this issue remains open to reasonable 9 debate. Notably, the Second Circuit recently ordered further briefing 10 on this issue, which reveals that the question is not settled in that 11 Circuit. See In re South African Apartheid, 617 F. Supp. 2d at 255 12 n.127; see also Docket no. 133 (Plaintiffs' Filing of Supplemental 13 Briefing in Presbyterian Church of Sudan). After receiving (and 14 presumably reviewing) that briefing, the Second Circuit simply noted 15 that Sosa specifically requires an inquiry into "'whether international 16 law extends the scope of liability' to corporations," and assumed 17 without deciding that "corporations such as Talisman may be held liable 18 for the violations of customary international law that plaintiffs 19 allege." Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 582 F.3d at 261 n.12 (quoting 20 Sosa, 542 U.S. at 732 n. 20). In addition, the Second Circuit again 21 requested briefing on this issue in a recent appeal of the South
22 African Apartheid decision. See Balintulo v. Daimler AG, Case No. 09-23 2778-cv(L) (Dec. 4, 2009 order requesting further briefing). This 24 Court therefore believes that, contrary to Plaintiffs' assertions that 25 this issue is well-settled, corporate liability remains open to 26 scrutiny.

27 Accordingly, the Court wishes to undertake a critical examination 28

1 of the legal arguments pro and con regarding corporate liability under 2 the Alien Tort Statute. As noted supra, this discussion draws heavily 3 on the two key cases resolving the question in favor of corporate 4 liability (the Presbyterian Church of Sudan and In re Agent Orange 5 district court opinions). These cases' reasoning is contrasted with 6 the only judicial decision to the contrary, Judge Korman's dissent in 7 Khulumani v. Barclay Nat. Bank Ltd., 504 F.3d 254, 321-26 (2d Cir.
8 2007). Having examined these and related authorities, the Court 9 concludes that the existing cases have not adequately identified any 10 international law norms governing corporations. Accordingly, the Court 11 concludes that corporations cannot be held directly liable under the 12 Alien Tort Statute for violating international law.

13 C. THE VARIOUS LINES OF REASONING

14 Simply put, the existing caselaw fails to provide persuasive 15 analysis of the question of corporate liability under international 16 law. The courts have mainly relied on the following lines of argument.
17 The Court examines the inadequacies of each argument, and concludes 18 that the existing cases fail to identify a universal, well-defined norm 19 of corporate liability under international law.

20 1. PRINCIPLE- AND LOGIC-BASED ARGUMENTS

21 One of the most prominent approaches to corporate liability rests 22 on general principles of fairness and logic. Courts have repeatedly 23 justified corporate liability on the ground that there is no reason why 24 corporations should not be liable for violating international law.
25 See, e.g., Romero v. Drummond Co., Inc., 552 F.3d 1303, 1315 (11th Cir.
26 2008) ("The text of the Alien Tort Statute provides no express 27 exception for corporations."); Khulumani v. Barclay Nat. Bank Ltd., 504 28

1 F.3d 254, 282 (2d Cir. 2007) (Katzmann, J., concurring) ("the issue of 2 whether corporations may be held liable under the Alien Tort Statute is 3 indistinguishable from the question of whether private individuals may 4 be"); In re XE Services, 665 F. Supp. 2d at 588 ("Nothing in the ATS
5 or Sosa may plausibly be read to distinguish between private 6 individuals and corporations. . . . [T]here is no identifiable
7 principle of civil liability which would distinguish between individual 8 and corporate defendants in these circumstances.") (emphasis added); 9 Bowoto v. Chevron, 2006 WL 2455752, at *9 ("The dividing line for 10 international law has traditionally fallen between states and private 11 actors. Once this line has been crossed and an international norm has 12 become sufficiently well established to reach private actors, there is 13 very little reason to differentiate between corporations and 14 individuals.") (emphasis added); Presbyterian Church of Sudan II, 374 15 F. Supp. 2d at 336 n.10 ("there is no principled basis for contending 16 that acts such as genocide are of mutual and not merely several concern 17 to states when the acts are performed by some private actors, like 18 individuals, but not by other private actors, like corporations")
19 (emphasis added); In re Agent Orange, 373 F. Supp. 2d at 58-59
20 ("Limiting civil liability to individuals while exonerating the 21 corporation directing the individual's action through its complex 22 operations and changing personnel makes little sense in today's 23 world.") (emphasis added); Presbyterian Church of Sudan I, 244 F. Supp.
24 2d at 318 ("[T]here is no logical reason why corporations should not be 25 held liable, at least in cases of jus cogens violations.") (emphasis 26 added).

27 The most thorough elaboration of this argument appears in In re 28

1 Agent Orange. Judge Weinstein explained:

2 Limiting civil liability to individuals while exonerating the 3 corporation directing the individual's action through its complex
4 operations and changing personnel makes little sense in today's 5 world. Our vital private activities are conducted primarily under 6 corporate auspices, only corporations have the wherewithal to 7 respond to massive toxic tort suits, and changing personnel means 8 that those individuals who acted on behalf of the corporation and 9 for its profit are often gone or deceased before they or the 10 corporation can be brought to justice. . . . Defendants present 11 no policy reason why corporations should be uniquely exempt from 12 tort liability under the ATS, and no court has presented one 13 either. . . . Such a result should hardly be surprising. A 14 private corporation is a juridical person and has no per se 15 immunity under U.S. domestic or international law. Given that 16 private individuals are liable for violations of international law 17 in certain circumstances, there is no logical reason why 18 corporations should not be held liable, at least in cases of jus
19 cogens violations. . . . Indeed, while [the defendant] disputes 20 the fact that corporations are capable of violating the law of 21 nations, it provides no logical argument supporting its claim.

22 In re Agent Orange, 373 F. Supp. 2d at 58-59 (citations and quotations 23 omitted).

24 This approach may be persuasive as a matter of abstract reasoning, 25 but it fails to comport with the Supreme Court's directives in Sosa.
26 Federal courts addressing claims under the Alien Tort Statute may only 27 recognize claims that "rest on a norm of international character 28 accepted by the civilized world and defined with a specificity comparable to the features of the 18th-century paradigms we have recognized [that is, piracy, safe-conduct violations, and infringements of the rights of ambassadors]." Sosa, 542 U.S. at 725. As the Sosa Court noted, "we now adhere to a conception of limited judicial power .
. . . that federal courts have no authority to derive 'general' common law." Id. at 729. The Court emphasized that Alien Tort Statute claims are not drawn from the ether but rather are "derived from the law of nations." Id. at 731 n.19. Thus, under Sosa, federal judges may not rely on their own ideas of what is right, fair, or logical. To 1 paraphrase Justice Scalia's concurrence, although "we" - i.e., federal 2 judges - "know ourselves to be eminently reasonable, self-awareness of 3 eminent reasonableness is not really a substitute for" universal and 4 well-defined norms of international law. Id. at 750 (Scalia, J., 5 concurring). Whatever the logical force of the domestic courts' 6 conclusions, Sosa simply prohibits that method of analysis. This Court 7 therefore concurs with Judge Korman's observation that "the issue here 8 is not whether policy considerations favor (or disfavor) corporate 9 responsibility for violations of international law." Khulumani, 504

10 F.3d at 325 (Korman, J., dissenting).<sup>63</sup>

11 Furthermore, the Court is not fully convinced that reason and 12 logic clearly compel the conclusion that corporations should be liable 13 under the Alien Tort Statute. As noted by Judge Korman:

14 There is a significant basis for distinguishing between personal 15 and corporate liability. Where the private actor is an individual, 16 he is held liable for acts which he has committed and for which he 17 bears moral responsibility. On the other hand, "legal entities, as 18 legal abstractions can neither think nor act as human beings, and 19 what is legally ascribed to them is the resulting harm produced by 20 individual conduct performed in the name or for the benefit of 21 those participating in them or sharing in their benefits."

22 Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 325 (Korman, J., dissenting) (quoting M. Cherif 23 Bassiouni, Crimes Against Humanity in International Criminal Law 378

---

24 <sup>63</sup> It should be emphasized that Sosa requires the international law 25 norm to be well-defined and widely recognized. International law 26 may, as a general matter, allow jurists to apply basic principles of 27 logic and reason. See, e.g., In re Piracy Jure Gentium, [1934] A.C.
28 586, 595 (P.C.) (rejecting argument that actual robbery is a sine qua non of piracy, and noting with respect to this argument that "their Lordships are almost tempted to say that a little common sense is a valuable quality in the interpretation of international law").
However, Sosa appears to bar domestic courts from engaging in that mode of analysis. Under Sosa, applicable rules of international law must be derived from universally recognized, well-defined international-law sources, not federal judges' particular notions of "common sense."

1 (2d ed.1999)). Ultimately, individuals, not legal entities, perform 2 the actions that violate international law. Therefore, it stands to 3 reason that the individuals should be held responsible.

4 One of the central animating forces behind domestic courts' 5 conclusions is an aspirational view of what the law should contain, not 6 what the law actually contains. However, Sosa prohibits courts from 7 substituting abstract aspirations - or even pragmatic concerns - in 8 place of specific international rules. See Sosa, 542 U.S. at 738 9 (rejecting plaintiff's argument because it "expresses an aspiration 10 that exceeds any binding customary rule having the specificity we 11 require."). The real question is whether international law actually 12 provides for corporate liability.

13 2. STARE DECISIS-BASED ARGUMENTS

14 The second most prominent line of argument relies on the fact that 15 domestic courts have consistently upheld corporate liability under the 16 Alien Tort Statute. For example, in Abdullahi v. Pfizer, the court 17 cited the per curiam decision in Khulumani for the proposition that "we 18 held that the ATS conferred jurisdiction over multinational 19 corporations that purportedly" violated international law. Abdullahi 20 v. Pfizer, 562 F.3d 163, 174 (2d Cir. 2009), cert. denied, 130 S.Ct.
21 3541 (2010). The Abdullahi v. Pfizer court accordingly treated the 22 question as settled.<sup>64</sup> District courts in the Second Circuit have 23 reached the same conclusion. In re South African Apartheid, 617 F.
24 Supp. 2d at 254-55; Presbyterian Church of Sudan II, 374 F. Supp. 2d at 25 335 (noting that, after Presbyterian Church of Sudan I, "the Second 26

---

27 <sup>64</sup> As noted supra, this question is decidedly not settled in the 28 Second Circuit. See Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 582 F.3d at 261 n.12.

1 Circuit twice confronted ATS cases with corporate defendants, and 2 neither time did it hold that corporations cannot be liable under 3 customary international law"); In re Agent Orange, 373 F. Supp. 2d at 4 58 ("The Second Circuit has considered numerous cases where plaintiffs 5 sued a corporation under the ATCA for alleged breaches of international 6 law.") (quotation omitted) (collecting cases); Presbyterian Church of 7 Sudan I, 244 F. Supp. 2d at 311-13 ("While the Second Circuit has not 8 explicitly held that corporations are potentially liable for violations 9 of the law of nations, it has considered numerous cases . . . where a 10 plaintiff sued a corporation under the ATCA for alleged breaches of 11 international law. . . . In each of these cases, the Second Circuit 12 acknowledged that corporations are potentially liable for violations of 13 the law of nations that ordinarily entail individual responsibility, 14 including jus cogens violations.") (collecting cases). Courts in other 15 circuits have adopted the same line of analysis. See Romero v.
16 Drummond Co., 552 F.3d 1303, 1315 (11th Cir. 2008) ("[T]he law of this 17 Circuit is that this statute grants jurisdiction from complaints of 18 torture against corporate defendants."); In re XE Services, 665 F.
19 Supp. 2d 569, 588 (E.D. Va. 2009) ("all courts to have considered the 20 question have concluded that" corporations may be held liable under 21 international law); In re South African Apartheid, 617 F. Supp. 2d at 22 254-55 ("On at least nine separate occasions, the Second Circuit has 23 addressed ATCA cases against corporations without ever hinting-much 24 less holding-that such cases are barred. . . . [T]his Court is bound by 25 the decisions of the Second Circuit."); Bowoto v. Chevron, 2006 WL 26 2455752, at *9 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 22, 2006) ("Both before and after Sosa, 27 courts have concluded that corporations may be held liable under the 28

1 | ATS." ).

2 |       None of these cases identifies a universal and well-defined
3 | standard of international law. In fact, none of these cases quotes or 4 | cites an earlier case that identifies a universal and well-defined
5 | standard of international law. Most of these cases refer to earlier
6 | cases that did not even mention corporate liability. Compare Romero v.
7 | Drummond Co., 552 F.3d at 1315 (citing Aldana v. Del Monte Fresh
8 | Produce, Inc., 416 F.3d 1242 (11th Cir. 2005), as binding circuit
9 | "precedent") with Aldana v. Del Monte Fresh Produce, Inc., 416 F.3d at 10 | 1244-53 (opinion is silent regarding corporate liability). This 11 | approach ignores the fundamental principle that "[q]uestions which 12 | merely lurk in the record, neither brought to the attention of the 13 | court nor ruled upon, are not to be considered as having been so
14 | decided as to constitute precedents." Webster v. Fall, 266 U.S. 507,
15 | 511, 45 S.Ct. 148, 69 L.Ed. 411 (1925); see also E. & J. Gallo Winery
16 | v. EnCana Corp., 503 F.3d 1027, 1046 n.14 (9th Cir. 2007) (same).

17 |       Accordingly, the Court affords little weight to the fact that 18 | various domestic courts have contemplated corporate liability (either
19 | explicitly or implicitly). Under Sosa, domestic precedents are only 20 | relevant to the extent that they identify a well-defined international 21 | law consensus.

22 |           3. EARLY HISTORICAL PRECEDENTS

23 |       As Sosa noted, piracy is one of the oldest and most well-defined
24 | examples of international law. There is some authority for the 25 | proposition that piracy can only be committed by individuals, not legal 26 | entities. As explained in Samuel Rutherford's seventeenth century
27 | treatise Lex, Rex, which is quoted among the extensive citations in

1 United States v. Smith, 18 U.S. 153 (1820):

2 A band of robbers or a company of pirates may in fact be united to 3 one another by compact, &c. But they are still, by the law of 4 nature, only a number of unconnected individuals; and 5 consequently, in the view of the law of nations they are not 6 considered as a collective body or public person. For the compact by which they unite themselves is void, because the matter of it is unlawful, &c. &c. The common benefit which a band of robbers or a company of pirates propose to themselves consists in doing harm to the rest of mankind.

7 Smith, 18 U.S. at 168-69 n.h quoting Rutherford, 2 Lex, Rex, ch. 9 8 (1644)) (emphasis added). In other words, a legal entity used for an 9 illegal purpose is traditionally void in international law.

10 This same view is stated by Blackstone regarding corporate crimes 11 more generally. As Blackstone wrote, "[a] corporation cannot commit 12 treason, or felony, or other crime, in its corporate capacity: though 13 its members may, in their distinct individual capacities. Neither is 14 it capable of suffering a traitor's, or felon's punishment, for it is 15 not liable to corporeal penalties, nor to attainder, forfeiture, or 16 corruption of blood." Blackstone, 1 Commentaries, Ch. 18.

17 On the other hand, the early authorities do not uniformly prohibit 18 corporate liability. Notably, in the early twentieth century the 19 Attorney General of the United States recommended that the Alien Tort 20 Statute could be used to remedy harms caused by a corporation's 21 violation of a water-rights treaty between the United States and 22 Mexico. Charles J. Bonaparte, Mexican Boundary - Diversion of the Rio 23 Grande, 26 Op. Atty. Gen. 250 (1907). The attorney general stated that 24 the Alien Tort Statute provides both "a right of action and a forum" 25 for Mexican citizens to bring an action against the corporation for the 26 harm they may have suffered from the diversion of the Rio Grande. Id.
27 at 252-53. The attorney general hedged a bit by noting that he could 28

1 not "undertake to say whether or not a suit under . . . the foregoing 2 statute[] would be successful," as such questions "could only be 3 determined by judicial decision." Id. This opinion, although somewhat 4 ambiguous and certainly not binding on this Court, provides at least 5 some historical support for the view that corporations may potentially 6 be held liable for violating international law.

7 4. NUREMBERG-BASED PRECEDENTS

8 Another set of historical precedents is contained in the decisions 9 of the Nuremberg Tribunals, which are generally viewed as the seminal 10 authorities in modern international criminal law.

11 The London Charter (the agreement through which the Nuremberg 12 Tribunals were formed and governed) explicitly recognized the existence 13 of "criminal organizations." The Charter specifically provided that 14 the Tribunal was empowered to declare certain organizations to be 15 "criminal organization[s]." London Charter, Art. 9. The effect of 16 this declaration was not to impose liability upon the organization 17 itself; rather, the declaration, if unrebutted before the Tribunal, 18 imposed automatic liability on the organization's individual members.
19 See Art. 9-10.<sup>65</sup> (Notably, Karl Rasche - the banker in "The Ministries

21 <sup>65</sup> In full, Article 9 reads:

22 At the trial of any individual member of any group or 23 organization the Tribunal may declare (in connection with any 24 act of which the individual may be convicted) that the group or 25 organization of which the individual was a member was a criminal 26 organization.

27 After the receipt of the Indictment the Tribunal shall give such 28 notice as it thinks fit that the prosecution intends to ask the Tribunal to make such declaration and any member of the organization will be entitled to apply to the Tribunal for leave to be heard by the Tribunal upon the question of the criminal character of the organization. The Tribunal shall have power to allow or reject the application. If the application is allowed, the Tribunal may direct in what manner the applicants shall be

1 Case" - was found guilty of being a member of the SS, which had been 2 deemed a "criminal organization" pursuant to this provision. United 3 States v. Von Weizsaecker, 14 T.W.C. at 863.)

4 Some courts have viewed this "criminal organization" provision as 5 an example of corporate liability. See Presbyterian Church of Sudan I, 6 244 F. Supp. 2d at 315. The better view - expressed by the Nuremberg 7 Tribunal itself - is that the "criminal organization" provision was a 8 mechanism for holding individual members of the organization liable for 9 other members' acts in the same manner that joint criminal enterprise 10 or conspiracy provides for such individual liability. See The 11 Nuremberg Trial, 6 F.R.D. 69, 132 (1946) ("A criminal organization is 12 analogous to a criminal conspiracy in that the essence of both is 13 cooperation for criminal purposes. There must be a group bound together 14 and organized for a common purpose. The group must be formed or used in 15 connection with the commission of crimes denounced by the Charter.");
16 see generally Prosecutor v. Vasiljevic, 2004 WL 2781932, at ¶ 102 17 (describing differences between aiding and abetting liability and joint 18 criminal enterprise liability). The London Charter did not provide for 19 entity responsibility as such; rather, it only authorized the Tribunals 20 to convict those person who "as individuals or as members of 21 organizations, committed" certain crimes. London Charter, art. 6 22 (emphasis added). In other words, the Charter recognized that some 23 _____

24 represented and heard.

25 Article 10 reads:

26 In cases where a group or organization is declared criminal by 27 the Tribunal, the competent national authority of any Signatory 28 shall have the right to bring individual to trial for membership therein before national, military or occupation courts. In any such case the criminal nature of the group or organization is considered proved and shall not be questioned.

1 individuals were acting "as members of organizations," but determined 2 that the individual members, rather than the organizations themselves, 3 were the proper defendants. In short, the Tribunal was only authorized 4 to establish "individual responsibility," art. 6, and simply could not 5 punish organizations. See United States v. Krauch, 8 T.W.C. at 1153 6 ("It is appropriate here to mention that the corporate defendant, 7 Farben, is not before the bar of this Tribunal and cannot be subjected 8 to criminal penalties in these proceedings."); see generally Khulumani, 9 504 F.3d at 322 & n.10 (Korman, J., dissenting).

10 That said, the Tribunals occasionally suggested that corporations 11 and organizations could be held separately responsible. Domestic 12 courts have relied heavily on these statements from the Tribunals. See 13 In re Agent Orange, 373 F. Supp. 2d at 57; Presbyterian Church of Sudan 14 I, 244 F. Supp. 2d at 315-16. The Tribunals' clearest discussion of 15 corporations appears in the United States v. Krauch decision, in which 16 the panel explicitly suggested that corporations may be liable for 17 certain war crimes relating to wartime plunder (or "spoliation," in the 18 terms used by the tribunal):

19 Where private individuals, including juristic persons, proceed to 20 exploit the military occupancy by acquiring private property 21 against the will and consent of the former owner, such action, not 22 being expressly justified by any applicable provision of the Hague 23 Regulations, is in violation of international law. The payment of 24 a price or other adequate consideration does not, under such 25 circumstances, relieve the act of its unlawful character.
Similarly where a private individual or a juristic person becomes a party to unlawful confiscation of public or private property by planning and executing a well-defined design to acquire such property permanently, acquisition under such circumstances subsequent to the confiscation constitutes conduct in violation of the Hague Regulations.

26 Krauch, 8 T.W.C. at 1132-33 (emphasis added).

27 The tribunal went on to explain, however, that the corporation 28

1 could not be held responsible for violating international law:
2 "corporations act through individuals and, under the conception of 3 personal individual guilt . . . , the prosecution, to discharge the 4 burden imposed upon it in this case, must establish by competent proof 5 . . . that an individual defendant was either a participant in the 6 illegal act or that, being aware thereof, he authorized or approved 7 it." Krauch, 8 T.W.C. at 1153 (emphasis added).<sup>66</sup> The tribunal 8 explained that its discussion of "corporations" and "juristic persons" 9 was mere obiter dictum that was "descriptive of the instrumentality of 10 cohesion in the name of which the enumerated acts of spoliation were 11 committed." See id. In other words, the tribunal's references to the 12 company were placeholders meant as shorthand for the individual members 13 of the company. The tribunal's references to the company were not 14 substantive discussions regarding legal responsibility. Accord In re 15 Agent Orange, 373 F. Supp. 2d at 57 ("In fact, in the Nuremberg trials, 16 this point of lack of corporate liability appeared to have been 17 explicitly stated.").

18 An illustration of the tribunals' "shorthand" approach can be 19 found in United States v. Krupp. The tribunal concluded "that the 20 confiscation of the Austin plant [a French tractor plant owned by the 21

---

22
23 <sup>66</sup> In an oft-quoted statement, one of the post-Nuremberg tribunals 24 expressed in strong, clear terms that only individuals were capable 25 of being punished for violating international law: "Crimes against 26 international law are committed by men, not by abstract entities, and 27 only by punishing individuals who commit such crimes can the 28 provisions of international law be enforced." The Nuremberg Trial, 6 F.R.D. 69, 110 (1946). The context of that discussion, however, reveals that the tribunal was rejecting the argument that international law applies only to sovereign states. See id.; see also Krauch, 8 T.W.C. at 1125. The tribunal was not referring specifically to questions of corporate liability.

1 Rothschilds] . . . and its subsequent detention by the Krupp firm 2 constitute a violation of Article 43 of the Hague Regulations which 3 requires that the laws in force in an occupied country be respected; 4 that it was also a violation of Article 46 of the Hague Regulations 5 which provides that private property must be respected; [and] that the 6 Krupp firm, through defendants Krupp, Loeser, Houdremont, Mueller, 7 Janssen, and Eberhardt, voluntarily and without duress participated in 8 these violations by purchasing and removing the machinery and leasing 9 the property of the Austin plant and in leasing the Paris property."
10 Krupp, 9 T.W.C. at 1352-53 (emphasis added). In light of this factual 11 conclusion, the tribunal held the individual defendants - not the 12 corporation itself - responsible for the wrongful acts. Id. at 1448-13 49; see also Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 322 (Korman, J., dissenting) 14 (noting similar discussion in United States v. Krauch, 7 T.W.C. at 11-15 14, 39, 50, 59).

16 Based on these cases, the fundamental conclusion is that the 17 Nuremberg-era tribunals did not impose any form of liability on 18 corporations or organizations as such. Rather, these tribunals were 19 imposing liability solely on the individuals members of the 20 corporations and organizations. The tribunals repeatedly noted this 21 fact, and their stray references to the contrary constitute nothing 22 more than dicta. The courts that have relied on this dicta have failed 23 to identify a sufficiently universal and well-defined international law 24 norm of corporate liability that satisfies Sosa. See Khulumani, 504 25 F.3d at 321-22 (Korman, J., dissenting).

26 5. TREATY- AND CONVENTION-BASED PRECEDENTS

27 With few exceptions, international treaties bind sovereign states 28

1 rather than private parties. See generally Presbyterian Church of 2 Sudan I, 244 F. Supp. 2d at 317 ("Treaties, by definition, are 3 concluded between states."); see also Edye v. Robertson (Head Money 4 Cases), 112 U.S. 580, 598 (1884) ("A treaty is primarily a compact 5 between independent nations."). In fact, the "major conventions 6 protecting basic human rights, such as the Genocide Convention and 7 common article 3 of the Geneva Convention, do not explicitly reach 8 corporations." Presbyterian Church of Sudan, 244 F. Supp. 2d at 317.
9 Instead, human rights conventions and treaties bind states or, on 10 occasion, natural persons. For example, treaties bind nations by 11 requiring them to enact domestic legislation outlawing slavery or the 12 slave trade, see 1926 Geneva Slavery Convention, arts. 2(b), 6; 13 requiring nations to outlaw forced labor and other wrongful labor 14 practices, see, e.g., Convention Concerning Forced or Compulsory Labor, 15 ILO no. 29, arts. 25-26, 39 U.N.T.S. 55, entered into force May 1, 16 1932; or requiring nations to outlaw illegal shipments of hazardous 17 wastes, see, e.g., Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary 18 Movements of Hazardous Wastes and Their Disposal, Arts. 4(2), 4(4), 19 4(7), 9(5), 1673 U.N.T.S. 57. Of course, domestic laws that implement 20 these treaties might be enforceable against corporations; but this 21 results from the operation of the domestic implementing law, not 22 international treaty law. The treaties themselves are silent regarding 23 corporate liability.

24 Despite these general principles of treaty law, the district court 25 in Presbyterian Church of Sudan identified a handful of treaties that 26 explicitly contemplate corporate liability. See generally Presbyterian 27 Church of Sudan, 244 F. Supp. 2d at 317. An oil pollution treaty 28

1 provides that a ship "owner" (defined as any "person" registered as the 2 owner) is liable for oil pollution damage caused by the ship's 3 discharge. Id. at 317 (citing International Convention on Civil 4 Liability for Oil Pollution Damage, Nov. 29, 1969, art. 3(1), 26 U.S.T.
5 765, 973 U.N.T.S. 3). Similarly, a nuclear treaty provides that "[t]he 6 operator of a nuclear installation" is liable for damage caused by the 7 installation; notably, the treaty specifically defines "operator" as 8 "any private or public body whether corporate or not." Id. (citing 9 Vienna Convention on Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage, May 21, 1963, 10 art. 2(1), 1063 U.N.T.S. 265). The 1976 Convention on Civil Liability 11 for Oil Pollution Damage Resulting from Exploration for and 12 Exploitation of Seabed Mineral Resources contains an identical 13 extension of liability to any person "whether corporate or not." Dec.
14 17, 1976, art. 5, reprinted at 16 I.L.M. 1450 (cited in Presbyterian 15 Church of Sudan I, 244 F. Supp. 2d at 317).

16 These treaties provide marginal authority at best with respect to 17 the relevant inquiry under Sosa of identifying a universal and well-18 defined international consensus regarding corporate liability for human 19 rights violations. These treaties involve transnational environmental 20 torts such as oil spills and nuclear accidents. See Steven R. Ratner, 21 Corporations and Human Rights: A Theory of Legal Responsibility, 111 22 Yale L.J. 443, 479-81 (2001). The international community has a direct 23 interest in regulating these forms of private behavior, as the harms 24 that flow from these torts extend beyond the national borders of the 25 situs of the act. See id. In fact, many scholars view these treaties 26 as constituting rules of private law rather than public international 27 law. Id. at 481 & nn.152-54. In any event, regardless of how these 28

1 treaties are characterized, they fail to identify a universal and well-2 defined international law standard for holding corporations responsible 3 for human rights abuses.

4 In addition to the specific environmental tort treaties, domestic 5 courts have also pointed to other international conventions and 6 international rule-making as indirect evidence of corporate liability.
7 See Presbyterian Church of Sudan I, 244 F. Supp. 2d at 318. The 8 Presbyterian Church of Sudan court relied on the declaration of 9 Professor Ralph G. Steinhardt for the proposition that the major human 10 rights treaties "do not distinguish between natural and juridical 11 individuals, and it is implausible that international law would protect 12 a corporation" that violated fundamental norms of international law.
13 Id. The Presbyterian Church of Sudan I court also looked to labor 14 treaties - none of which actually state that they apply to corporations 15 - which, in the court's words, "clearly 'presuppose[] . . . a duty on 16 the corporation not to interfere with the ability of employees to form 17 unions.'" Id. at 317 (quoting Ratner, Corporations and Human Rights, 18 111 Yale L.J. at 478-79). In light of Sosa, it should be clear that 19 Sosa's requirements are not satisfied by the possibility of corporate 20 liability, id. at 316 ("corporations may be liable under codified 21 international law") (emphasis added), or by one professor's suggestion 22 as to what is or is not plausible, id. ("it is implausible that 23 international law would protect a corporation") (emphasis added), or by 24 yet another professor's conclusion that labor treaties implicitly 25 presuppose corporate liability, id. at 317 ("a major International 26 Labour Organization convention clearly 'presupposes . . . a duty on 27 the corporation'" ) (emphasis added).

1 The Presbyterian Church of Sudan I court also relied on the 2 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which the court asserted was 3 "binding on states as well as corporations." Id. at 318. The 4 Universal Declaration provides that "every individual and every organ 5 of society" shall "strive . . . to promote respect" for the fundamental 6 human rights described in the Convention. Notably, the Sosa Court 7 expressly rejected the plaintiff's reliance on the Universal 8 Declaration of Human Rights because "the Declaration does not of its 9 own force impose obligations as a matter of international law," but 10 rather is "'a statement of principles'" that are non-binding in nature.
11 Sosa, 542 U.S. at 734-35 (quoting Eleanor Roosevelt, cited in Humphrey, 12 The UN Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights 39, 50 (E.
13 Luard ed. 1967)). In any event, even if the Universal Declaration were 14 a binding statement of international law, it is unclear that it 15 actually applies to corporations. The Presbyterian Church of Sudan I 16 court relied on a short essay written by the prominent international 17 law professor Louis Henkin, which explains that "every individual and 18 every organ of society" as used in the Universal Declaration "includes 19 juridical persons. Every individual and every organ of society 20 excludes no one, no company, no market, no cyberspace. The Universal 21 Declaration applies to them all." Louis Henkin, The Universal 22 Declaration at 50 and the Challenge of Global Markets, 25 Brook. J.
23 Int'l L. 17, 25 (1999) (quoted in Presbyterian Church of Sudan I, 244 24 F. Supp. 2d at 318). But notably absent from the Presbyterian Church 25 of Sudan I's discussion is the opening sentence of that paragraph of 26 Henkin's essay: "At this juncture the Universal Declaration may also 27 address multinational companies." Henkin, The Universal Declaration at 28

1 50, 25 Brook. J. Int'l L. at 25 (emphasis added). Needless to say, the 2 mere possibility of corporate liability is different from a well-3 defined international consensus on the issue. See Khulumani, 504 F.3d 4 at 324 (Korman, J., dissenting) (citing Carlos M. Vázquez, Direct vs.
5 Indirect Obligations of Corporations Under International Law, 43 Colum.
6 J. Transnat'l L. 927, 942 (2005)). The Universal Declaration of Human 7 Rights therefore stands among the other aspirational international 8 attempts at identifying and defining corporate liability for human 9 rights violations.<sup>67</sup> As the Supreme Court wrote in Sosa, "that a rule 10 as stated is as far from full realization as the one [plaintiff] urges 11 is evidence against its status as binding law." Sosa, 542 U.S. at 738 12 n.29 (emphasis added).

13 As a final source of international law, the Presbyterian Church of 14 Sudan I court also relied on the United Nations' practice of imposing 15 economic sanctions, which although "formally directed at states, they 16 also entail certain duties for corporations." Presbyterian Church of 17

---

18 <sup>67</sup> For example, the United Nations Code of Conduct on Transnational 19 Corporations has been through a pair of drafts (one in 1983 and 20 another in 1990), but has never been formally adopted by any nation.
21 Similar efforts have likewise resulted in purely aspirational, 22 theoretical documents that are non-binding and in no way reflective 23 of international law. See Development and International Economic Co-24 operation: Transnational Corporations, U.N. ESCOR, 2d Sess., U.N.
25 Doc. E/1990/94 (1990); Draft United Nations Code of Conduct on 26 Transnational Corporations, U.N. ESCOR, Spec. Sess., Supp. No. 7, 27 Annex II, U.N. Doc. E/1983/17/Rev.1 (1983); see also U.N. Econ. &
28 Soc. Council (ECOSOC), Sub-Comm'n on Promotion & Prot. of Human Rights, Norms on the Responsibilities of Transnational Corporations and Other Business Enterprises with Regard to Human Rights, U.N. Doc.
E/CN.4/Sub.2/2003/L.8 (Aug. 7, 2003); cf. Report of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General on the Issue of Human Rights and Transnational Corporations and Other Business Enterprises, Business and Human Rights: Mapping International Standards of Responsibility and Accountability for Corporate Acts, UN Doc.
A/HRC/4/35, ¶ 20 (Feb. 19, 2007).

1 Sudan I, 244 F. Supp. 2d at 318. None of the sanctions were directly 2 applied to corporations, though; if a corporate act violated the 3 sanctions, the state of the corporation's citizenship would be held 4 responsible for violating the sanctions. Id. The court also pointed 5 to United Nations General Assembly Resolutions, which by their very 6 nature are non-binding. See Flores v. Southern Peru Copper Corp., 414 7 F.3d 233, 259-62 (2d Cir. 2003). In addition, the court relied on the 8 practice of the European Union, which, under the 1957 Treaty of Rome 9 (which established the Union) and subsequent treaties, has implemented 10 regulations directly against corporations in areas such as antitrust 11 and socioeconomic discrimination. Presbyterian Church of Sudan I, 244 12 F. Supp. 2d at 318.

13 In short, courts have identified various treaties, conventions, 14 and international proclamations as support for the view that 15 international law recognizes corporate liability. However, none of 16 these international law sources provides a well-defined universal 17 consensus regarding corporate liability. These authorities, without 18 more, fail to satisfy Sosa's requirements.

19 On the contrary, treaty-based international law provides a rather 20 compelling (although not definitive) argument against treating 21 corporate liability as an actionable rule of international law. The 22 drafting history of the 1998 Rome Statute of the International Criminal 23 Court reveals that the global community of nation-states in fact lacks 24 a consensus regarding corporate liability for human rights violations.
25 See Khulumani, 504 F.3d at 322-23 (Korman, J., dissenting). Thus, not 26 only have the supporters of corporate liability failed to meet their 27 affirmative burden of identifying well-defined, universally 28

1 acknowledged international norms of corporate liability, but the 2 opponents of corporate liability have affirmatively shown that such a 3 well-defined global consensus does not exist. "Since as a practical 4 matter it is never easy to prove a negative," Bartnicki v. Vopper, 532 5 U.S. 514, 552, 121 S.Ct. 1753, 1775 (2001) (quoting Elkins v. United 6 States, 364 U.S. 206, 218, 80 S.Ct. 1437, 1445 (1960)), the Rome
7 Statute negotiating history provides particularly compelling evidence 8 that there is not a global consensus of corporate responsibility for 9 human rights violations under international law.

10 The negotiating history of Rome Statute shows that the global 11 community has been unable to reach a consensus regarding corporate 12 responsibility for international human rights violations. Although the 13 initial drafts of the Statute provided for corporate liability, this 14 provision was specifically deleted from the final version. See 2 15 United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the 16 Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June - 17
17 July 1998, at 135 (2002). There were a number of reasons for deleting 18 the provision,<sup>68</sup> and the most prominent reason was the absence of 19 international uniformity regarding "acceptable definitions" of 20 corporate liability. Delegates from China, Lebanon, Sweden, Mexico, 21 Thailand, Syria, Greece, Egypt, Poland, Slovenia, El Salvador, Yemen, 22 and Iran firmly opposed the inclusion of corporate liability.

23 24 <sup>68</sup> In full, the chairman summarized negotiations as centering on these 25 questions: "Many delegations had difficulty in accepting any 26 reference to 'legal persons' or 'criminal organizations', the reasons 27 given being the problem of implementation in domestic law, the 28 difficulty of finding acceptable definitions, the implications for the complementarity principle, the possible creation of new obligations for States, and the challenge to what was considered the exclusive focus of the Statute, namely individual criminal responsibility." Id. at 135.

1 Delegates from Australia, Ukraine, Cuba, Argentina, Singapore, 2 Venezuela, Algeria, the United States, Denmark, Finland, Portugal, and 3 Korea expressed hesitation on account of the disparity in practice 4 among states. Id. at ¶¶ 35-39, 43-48, 51, 53-65. One of the central 5 points of concern involved the lack of a clear definition among states 6 (and indeed, the absence of corporate criminal liability in many 7 states). See id.<sup>69</sup> As a result, the Rome Statute only applies to 8 "natural persons." Rome Statute, art. 25(1).

9 The Rome Statute's negotiating history therefore reveals that 10 corporate liability fails to satisfy either of Sosa's two key 11 requirements - that the norm must be based on clearly defined and 12 universally recognized international law. As noted in Sosa, "we now 13 tend to understand common law not as a discoverable reflection of 14 universal reason but, in a positivistic way, as a product of human 15 choice." Sosa, 542 U.S. at 729. The positivistic approach leads to a 16

---

17 <sup>69</sup> The negotiating history of the Rome Statute is further supported by 18 specific evidence of legal practice among foreign nations. There is 19 a wide variety of forms of corporate liability within domestic legal 20 systems. Some countries do not even recognize corporations as being 21 capable of committing crimes. See, e.g., Hans de Doelder & Klaus 22 Tiedemann, eds., Criminal Liability of Corporations 343 (1996) 23 (Russia only recognizes natural persons as capable of committing 24 crimes). Even the countries that recognize corporate criminal 25 liability are divided on the appropriate rules of attributing conduct 26 and culpability to the corporate entity. See id. at 104-05, 186-87, 27 131, 372, 398 (standards include attribution through the acts of 28 control persons [Australia, United Kingdom], the acts of any agent [United States, Finland], or other formulations of liability [Canada, Netherlands]). This divergence in opinion is not merely a disagreement on the procedural aspects of criminal punishment. It reflects a fundamental disagreement on the legal capacity of corporations to commit particular acts and the substantive rules of attributing an agent's conduct to the principal. Given this widespread disagreement, it seems clear that the relevant norms are not sufficiently well-defined among foreign nations to satisfy the requirements of Sosa.

1 clear conclusion: there has not been a clear "human choice" to impose 2 liability on corporations for violating international norms. Indeed, 3 to the extent that there has been a choice, the governments drafting 4 the Rome Statute chose not to extend liability to corporations.

5 Of course, the Court does not intend to suggest that the Rome
6 Statute is the sole authority for construing international law norms 7 under Sosa. See, e.g., Abagninin, 545 F.3d at 738-40 (rejecting 8 plaintiffs' reliance on Rome Statute with respect to genocide because 9 Rome Statute's definition of genocide conflicted with definition that 10 was uniformly adopted by other authorities). Nor does the negotiating 11 history of the Rome Statute provide a definitive international 12 rejection of corporate liability in international law. A fair amount 13 of the delegates' opposition to corporate liability arose from the 14 eleventh-hour nature of the proposal to include corporate liability.
15 See generally 2 United Nations Diplomatic Conference on the 16 Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome, 15 June - 17
17 July 1998, at 133-36. In addition, others were concerned with the idea 18 of imposing corporate criminal responsibility, but were silent 19 regarding the possibility of corporate civil responsibility. Id. As 20 international-crimes expert Professor Bassiouni has emphasized, it is 21 important to distinguish the substantive elements of international law 22 from the sometimes-idiosyncratic procedural systems that are used to 23 enforce those substantive rules. M. Cherif Bassiouni, 1 International 24 Criminal Law 5, 7-8 (2008). It is important not to place too much 25 weight on the Rome Statute, which defined certain crimes and created 26 certain enforcement mechanisms, but was not intended to serve as an 27 encyclopedic restatement of the full body of international law. The 28

1 negotiating history must therefore be viewed as persuasive rather than 2 conclusive authority for purposes of the Alien Tort Statute.

3 In the end, though, international treaties and conventions reveal 4 an absence of international human rights norms governing corporate 5 conduct. As noted by the United Nations Special Representative of the 6 Secretary-General, "states have been unwilling to adopt binding 7 international human rights standards for corporations." Representative 8 of the Secretary-General, Business and Human Rights: Mapping 9 International Standards of Responsibility and Accountability for 10 Corporate Acts, at ¶ 44 (2007). Instead, the only pertinent 11 authorities are "soft law standards and initiatives." Id. Such non-12 binding, aspirational norms are insufficient under Sosa.

13 6. INTERNATIONAL PRACTICE

14 Another line of reasoning was set forth in Judge Cote's decision 15 in Presbyterian Church of Sudan II, which re-affirmed Judge Schwartz's 16 prior decision and, in light of the intervening Supreme Court decision 17 in Sosa, supplemented Judge Schwartz's reasoning.

18 In re-assessing the applicability of Alien Tort Statute to 19 corporations in light of Sosa, the Presbyterian Church of Sudan II 20 court relied heavily on the fact that no country had ever objected to 21 domestic courts' exercise of jurisdiction over corporations under the 22 Alien Tort Statute. The court stated that "[o]ne of the clearest means 23 for determining the content of a rule of customary international law is 24 to examine situations where a governmental institution asserts a claim 25 purportedly based on the customary rule, and to consider, as part of 26 state practice, whether States with competing interests object."
27 Presbyterian Church of Sudan II, 374 F. Supp. 2d at 336. This 28

1 proposition is drawn from the general rule that there is "only [one] 2 way that customary international law can change - by one state's 3 violating the old norm and other states' acquiescing in the violation."
4 Phillip R. Trimble, The Supreme Court and International Law, 89 Am. J.
5 Int'l L. 53, 55 (1995). However, this general rule presupposes that a 6 customary international law norm exists in the first instance - i.e., 7 that there is an "old norm" governing state behavior. Objections 8 become relevant only after that "old norm" exists; once the rule is 9 established, the rule may be altered when other states deviate and no 10 objections are lodged. This is the approach stated in the Restatement, 11 which explains that state practice is evidence of customary 12 international law only "where there is broad acceptance and no or 13 little objection" by other states. Restatement (Third) of Foreign 14 Relations Law, § 102 n.2 (emphasis added). In other words, objections 15 are only relevant if states have already accepted a particular norm as 16 constituting binding international law.

17 The Presbyterian Church of Sudan II court concluded that it was 18 highly relevant that foreign governments acquiesced in the domestic 19 courts' exercise of Alien Tort Statute jurisdiction over those 20 governments' corporations. Presbyterian Church of Sudan II, 374 F.
21 Supp. 2d at 337. The court explained that those governments presumably 22 would have objected if domestic courts were incorrectly applying 23 international law against corporate defendants. Id. As the court 24 explained: "Talisman has not cited a single case where any government 25 objected to the exercise of jurisdiction over one of its national 26 corporations based on the principle that it is not a violation of 27 international law for corporations to commit or aid in the commission 28

1 of genocide or other similar atrocities. If this issue was a genuine 2 source of disagreement in the international community, it would be 3 expected that the assertion of such a rule as customary would provoke 4 objections from States whose interests were implicated by the assertion 5 of the rule in those cases against their nationals." Id.

6 The Court recognizes that the Presbyterian Church of Sudan II
7 court's analysis would be correct if in fact there was, as that court 8 suggested, "compelling evidence of state practice" holding corporations 9 responsible for international human rights violations. Id. However, 10 the Court disagrees with the premise that there is "compelling 11 evidence" of an international consensus regarding corporate liability.
12 See generally supra. Absent any "old norm" of corporate liability, see 13 Trimble, 89 Am. J. Int'l L. at 55, that has achieved "broad acceptance" 14 among the international community, see Restatement, § 102 n.2, the 15 Court disagrees with the Presbyterian Church of Sudan II court's 16 reliance on the absence of objections from foreign governments. Mere 17 silence and acquiescence does not provide probative evidence of a well-18 defined universal norm of international law.

19 7. SUMMARY OF DOMESTIC COURTS' REASONING

20 Above all, domestic courts have been guided by a single erroneous 21 assumption: that the burden is on corporations to show that 22 international law does not recognize corporate liability. See, e.g., 23 In re Agent Orange, 373 F. Supp. 2d at 59 ("Defendants present no 24 policy reason why corporations should be uniquely exempt from tort 25 liability under the ATS, and no court has presented one either.") 26 (quotations omitted); Presbyterian Church of Sudan I, 244 F. Supp. 2d 27 at 319 ("while Talisman disputes the fact that corporations are capable 28

1 of violating the law of nations, it provides no logical argument
2 supporting its claim."). Instead, this Court believes that Sosa 3 requires courts to undertake the opposite analysis: the plaintiffs must 4 bear the burden to show that international law does recognize corporate 5 liability. As the Supreme Court emphasized, "federal courts should not 6 recognize private claims under federal common law for violations of any 7 international law norm with less definite content and acceptance among 8 civilized nations than the historical paradigms familiar when § 1350 9 was enacted." Sosa, 542 U.S. at 732. Plaintiffs seeking to identify a 10 cause of action under international law bear the burden of persuading 11 the Court that international law contains a norm with sufficiently 12 "definite content and acceptance among civilized nations." Id. If the 13 Court is not persuaded that international law satisfies this standard, 14 then the plaintiff's claim must fail. This burden-shifting approach is 15 consistent with the general rule that plaintiffs bear the burden of 16 proving the elements of their claims. See generally Schaffer ex rel.
17 Schaffer v. Weast, 546 U.S. 49, 56-57 (2005) (collecting cases).
18 Furthermore, this is the burden-shifting approach applied by Sosa 19 itself: because the plaintiff Alvarez-Machain had not shown that he 20 suffered an injury in violation of international law, his claims 21 failed. See Sosa, 542 U.S. at 736 ("Alvarez cites little authority 22 that a rule so broad has the status of a binding customary norm 23 today"), 737 ("Alvarez's failure to marshal support for his proposed 24 rule is underscored by the Restatement (Third) of Foreign Relations Law 25 of the United States"), 738 ("Whatever may be said for the broad 26 principle Alvarez advances, in the present, imperfect world, it 27 expresses an aspiration that exceeds any binding customary rule having 28

1 the specificity we require.”).

2 In other words, international law must contain rules establishing 3 corporate liability. This Court therefore disagrees with the other 4 courts that have inverted this legal standard and examined whether 5 international law contains rules establishing corporate immunity. See 6 Romero v. Drummond Co., Inc., 552 F.3d at 1315 (“The text of the Alien 7 Tort Statute provides no express exception for corporations.”)
8 (emphasis added); In re Agent Orange, 373 F. Supp. 2d at 59
9 (“Defendants present no policy reason why corporations should be 10 uniquely exempt from tort liability under the ATS, and no court has 11 presented one either.”); Prebyterian Church of Sudan I, 244 F. Supp. 2d 12 at 319 (“A private corporation . . . has no per se immunity under U.S.
13 domestic or international law.”) (emphasis added); see also In re South 14 African Apartheid, 617 F. Supp. 2d at 255 n.127 (noting that Second 15 Circuit could potentially “determine that corporations are immune from 16 liability under customary international law”) (emphasis added). These 17 courts start from the erroneous premise that international law norms do 18 apply to corporations, and then search for significant international 19 precedents that reject corporate liability. However, as demonstrated 20 supra, no court has yet identified a sufficiently well-defined and 21 universally recognized international law norm establishing corporate 22 liability in the first place. In this Court’s view, the Supreme 23 Court’s guidance in Sosa requires that, at present, corporations may 24 not be held liable under international law in an Alien Tort Statute 25 action.

26 8. THIS COURT’S CONCLUSION

27 Having examined the legal arguments pro and con regarding 28

1 corporate liability for international human rights violations, the 2 Court concludes that corporations as such may not presently be sued 3 under Sosa and the Alien Tort Statute. There is no support in the 4 relevant sources of international law for the proposition that 5 corporations are legally responsible for international law violations.
6 International law is silent on this question: no relevant treaties, 7 international practice, or international caselaw provide for corporate 8 liability. Instead, all of the available international law materials 9 apply only to states or natural persons. Sosa's minimum standards of 10 definiteness and consensus have not been satisfied. It is impossible 11 for a rule of international law to be universal and well-defined if it 12 does not appear in anything other than a handful of law review 13 articles. Judicial diktat cannot change the basic fact that 14 international law does not recognize corporate liability.

15 To the extent that corporations should be liable for violating 16 international law, that is a matter best left for Congress to decide.
17 See Sosa, 542 U.S. at 728 ("We have no congressional mandate to seek 18 out and define new and debatable violations of the law of nations, and 19 modern indications of congressional understanding of the judicial role 20 in the field have not affirmatively encouraged greater judicial 21 creativity."). However, to the extent that Congress has ever addressed 22 the question of corporate liability for violating international law, it 23 has explicitly refrained from extending liability beyond natural 24 persons under the Torture Victim Protection Act. See supra Part 25 VIII.B. Accordingly, the Court concludes that corporations as such may 26 not be sued under the Alien Tort Statute. Corporate agents - i.e., 27 natural persons - are subject to civil actions, but corporations 28

1 themselves are not. Based on the authorities identified by the parties 2 and by other courts, the Court concludes that corporations may not be 3 sued under the Alien Tort Statute.<sup>70</sup>

5 <sup>70</sup>The Court is aware of potential arguments premised on the existence 6 of generally recognized principles of corporate liability and/or 7 principal-agent liability under domestic bodies of law. See, e.g., 8 Supp. Brief of Plaintiffs-Appellants/Cross-Appellees, Sarei v. Rio 9 Tinto, PLC, 2010 WL 804413, at *53 (9th Cir. Jan. 22, 2010); Brief of 10 Amicus Curiae Earthrights International in Support of 11 Plaintiffs-Appellants, Presbyterian Church of Sudan, No. 07-0016, 12 2007 WL 7073749, at *18-19 & nn. 5-7 (2d Cir. Mar. 9, 2007). The 13 Court notes that international law sometimes looks to "general 14 principles common to the major legal systems of the world" that 15 operate "interstitially" to fill gaps in international law "when 16 there has not been practice by states sufficient to give the 17 particular principle status as customary law and the principle has 18 not been legislated by general international agreement." Restatement 19 (Third) of Foreign Relations, § 102(1)(c) & cmt. 1. However, the 20 Court also notes that international law does not address "[m]atters 21 of 'several' concern among States" - that is, "matters in which 22 States are separately and independently interested." Flores, 414
23 F.3d at 249 (emphasis added). Accordingly, while theft and murder 24 (for example) are prohibited around the world, these rules do not 25 constitute customary international law because the "nations of the 26 world have not demonstrated that this wrong is of mutual, and not 27 merely several, concern." Id. (quotations omitted).

18 Furthermore, even if litigants attempted to identify general 19 international norms that might form the building blocks of corporate 20 liability, the Court disagrees with the premise that Sosa allows 21 federal courts to build a new rule of international law by combining 22 separate and distinct rules. So even if a court were to conclude 23 that the "general principles" of law recognize corporations as legal 24 persons, see, e.g., Case Concerning The Barcelona Traction, Light & 25 Power Co., 1970 I.C.J. 3, and were further to conclude that the 26 "general principles" of law incorporate general principles of agency 27 responsibility, see, e.g., Blackstone, 1 Commentaries, ch. 14;
28 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, art. 7, May 23, 1969, 1155
U.N.T.S. 331; International Law Commission, Draft Articles of State Responsibility, arts. 4, 5, 7, 8, 11; but see Convention on the Law Applicable to Agency, Mar. 14, 1978 (only four countries have adopted international treaty regarding agency law), the Court would be inclined to conclude that Sosa requires plaintiffs to identify well-defined rules of law that have already achieved clear recognition by a wide consensus of states in the exact form in which they are being applied under the Alien Tort Statute. Under Sosa, proponents of corporate liability are faced with the steep hurdle of showing that not only that general principles of agency liability exist, but that

1           D.     SUMMARY OF CORPORATE LIABILITY

2           Having thoroughly considered the question of corporate liability 3 under the Alien Tort Statute, the Court concludes that the existing 4 authorities fail to show that corporate liability is sufficiently well-5 defined and universal to satisfy Sosa.

7           XI.   CONCLUSION

8           In light of the foregoing analysis, the Court GRANTS Defendants' 9 Motion to Dismiss. To the extent that the Court has not addressed any 10 the parties' remaining arguments, the Court's analysis has rendered 11 those issues moot.

12           Given Plaintiffs' representations in its briefing and at oral 13 argument, it appears that further amendment of the Complaint would be 14 futile. Plaintiffs have already amended the Complaint in order to 15 provide additional factual details, and they have not suggested to the 16 Court that they left out any material facts. It appears to the Court 17 that Plaintiffs hold a very different view of the legal principles 18 discussed in this Order. If that is the case, Plaintiffs would be 19 well-advised to consider filing an appeal rather than filing an amended 20 complaint. However, because the Ninth Circuit has articulated a strong 21 policy in favor of permitting complaints to be amended, e.g., Eminence 22 Capital, LLC v. Aspeon, Inc., 316 F.3d 1048, 1051-52 (9th Cir. 2003), 23 the Court will provide Plaintiffs another opportunity to amend their 24 Complaint.

25
26           _____

27           these principles are well-defined and well-established in the 28           corporate context. Absent such a showing, domestic courts simply cannot conclude that rules of corporate agency attribution are clearly defined and universally agreed-upon.
